CHRISTIANITY AND THE EDUCATION OF THE WORLD;

OR,

A Dialogue on the Second of the Essays and Reviews.

WELL, H., have you read the Essays and Reviews ?

H. I have ; I am somewhat late in doing so ; I thought I might have seen them abroad, but the book was not sent me as I expected. But my sojourn there has enabled me to judge somewhat more distinctly of the character of this effort. As might be supposed, it is not an isolated one in the remarkable working of principles, both good and evil, which we see in the present day.

W. You do not mean that rationalism is on the increase in Germany,—I think you were last in that country ?

H. By no means. It had found the extreme of its limits, both religiously and philosophically, and the reaction has necessarily set in : for truth there is, and good there is, at least in God, in spite of man ; and when men have displayed the extremes to which the evil of human nature, and human will, and its revolt against God can go, there is, under Divine light, at least till man, as we read, be given up to believe a lie, a reaction of natural conscience, and the instinct which knows and feels that a God there is, and that He is and must be good. Under this influence man revolts against what shocks a conscience informed by Christianity, and in a general way, desires to have to say to God, because he has learned that He is good, and feels that a bad God, a God with whom we have nothing to do, and a revelation that is only deceit and falsehood, can give no comfort. I have no thought that a man can go right without grace, but there is a natural conscience which sees through dishonesty, and wants truth and grace; sees, at least, that the contrary is not a true representation of God. It wants something more sure in a revelation, than a product of man's mind, a history of the Hebrew monarchy, or an inspiration somewhat, perhaps, superior to Shakspeare, which learned men can criticise. This may do for Essayists and Reviewers, but it won't do for the wants of the soul in daily life. It won't do for the poor. Such views may make pretentious infidels of them, retailing what they have read, and thinking themselves wise, because they have a certain number of objections against what is good and blessed; but they can give no help or food to any. I have always remarked of infidels, or infidel writers, (for it is better to call things by their names,) that they can make you doubt (no wonder) of many things, but they can give you nothing. They never give you one certain truth. The word of God gives you many certain truths. It makes you doubt of nothing. It has no need; for it possesses the truth, and gives what is positive. This is an immense difference; it stamps both morally. When infidel minds speak of a love of truth, they never, that I can see, go further than Pilate: What is truth? It is never a holding fast truth they have got, but a casting doubt on what others believe, and professing to search for it, always to be ready to receive it, I suppose, because they have never got it.

W. But when you speak of the wants of the soul, do you believe that in the mass of men these spiritual wants exist?

H. I believe there are hidden wants everywhere. I do not say a new nature, a changed will, but cravings of a soul that has capacities beyond the sphere in which it is imprisoned ; rarely shewing themselves in the toil and follies of life, but which press into notice on particular occasions through the disordered throng of thoughts which crowd the avenues, and people the busy interior, of a dissipated and care-burdened existence. But it is not of this I speak now. I think that the mass of the poor have more reality of thought than reasoners,—see more justly the true character of things. Their occupation with labour gives this ; they toil to exist. That is now God's ordinance. What they get outside this, must be real. Speculation has no place here. They may know nothing of a revelation, but if they have the thought that there is one, they want one that is a revelation from God,—something He has told them, not an improved Shakspeare. If they have Diana and Jupiter, they take Diana and Jupiter as realities. If they are under the law of Moses, they will not spiritualise everything with Philo, or his modern imitators. They will take it as Moses gave it, or not at all. If they are idolators, they will be idolators bonâ fide, not readers of Lucian. If they are sceptical,—if this pervades the population, not merely religion, but the state, is near its end. I mean by that, society. When man speculates on the sanctions of social life,—when the divine, ever-living power of faith is gone, what holds man subject to something superior to himself ;—when what links man to man is gone, self is dominant, conscious that it is self. A few minds may speculate on how much may be true, and seek refined notions out of the condemned mass of materials ; the mass of men will be indifferent to all. Despotism or anarchy ensues. How long did the Roman empire survive Lucian, who was but a sign of the times ? or the French monarchy the Encyclopedists ? On the fall of Rome, Christianity came in as a bond ; now I see not what will, save the faithfulness of God and the Lord himself from heaven. This does not prove that anything is true, I admit ; but it proves that there is moral power in faith, and that the absence of faith is the destruction of society. And upon the face of it, the faith of the masses is not discriminative speculation.

W. But are you one of those who take religion to be a means subservient to society?

H. God forbid. The revelation of God is, for me, the putting an immortal soul, through grace, in communication with the eternal fountain of blessedness, of light, of love—with God himself. Doubtless, most important revelations accompany it, necessary for the existence or full development of this. I have God manifest in the flesh. I have the blessed relationships of Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, without which it is impossible for man to be thus connected with God. I have besides, the Church united to Christ; subjects into which I cannot enter now, but which, while, when revealed, they give to us conscious links of union with what is divine, and develop divine affections in the relationships they place us in, must be the subject of revelation. Man's mind cannot go beyond its own sphere. It is not God, and if it is to be really elevated, must be elevated by something that is outside and above itself. That is, there must be a positive revelation of something not within the sphere of its own proper apprehensions. It may develop its own powers, it may create poetically what is within the sphere of those powers; but in the nature of things it cannot by itself get beyond itself. You may have Shakspeare to give all the scope of the human mind, all its workings, in a course of pictures, from its highest to its lowest forms, with a graphic truth which may interest in the most absorbing way inferior minds to his—minds which cannot do this for themselves; but it is always and must be the human mind, and within the sphere of its own limits, or it would not be the human mind. The consequence is, that though it may elevate these inferior minds above their level, it contents them with man, and in result, by excluding God, degrades them from what they might be. Poetry is the effort of the human mind to create, by imagination, a sphere beyond materialism which faith gives in realities. But then it cannot rise above the level of its source, whatever displays of force there may be by its being conducted in a secret channel, and not exposed to be wasted in the open intercourse of the world. In result, it sinks down to the level towards which all human nature runs, and then settles, not to rise again. There may be a certain subjective development of mind in its use, but no more.

W. But men speak of the inspiration of Shakspeare and others; even of ordinary men under happy or religious influences.

H. There is a confusion of language and thought between revelation and inspiration. We may use the latter term figuratively of the animated efforts of the human mind, compared with the platitudes of ordinary life, or as is habitually done of the instrumental power by which unknown truths are communicated by God to the human mind; but revelation is quite another thing, of which inspiration in the highest sense is but the form or instrument (for it is both); that is, the actual presentation to us of an object, or truth, or a fact not otherwise known. Here I get an additional object, not otherwise obtained for the human mind. As to will, moral or spiritual qualities, the mind may or may not be capable of discerning or appreciating it. That is a theological question, a most important one, but not exactly our topic now. But revelation is the declaration, the actual promulgation of otherwise unknown truths; often those which could not otherwise be known. Sometimes of those which in the actual condition of the individuals could not be known.

There is another enormous moral mistake, that internal power is that by which man advances in the moral scale of being. Power in man is limited to what man is. That is no advance beyond what he is.

An acorn may become an oak, but in its nature it is never but an oak. Even so power is not the real thing that elevates man (though in man there is another question, an oak is not a corrupt fallen thing). "I can do all that may become a man; who can do more is none." There is man's power at its limit. If I may quote one who amongst men had hardly his like, I find more. I only say now, he pretends to more. Let history and facts judge of his claim. I can do all things through him that strengthens me. Here I find another and divine source of strength carrying him morally beyond man. But to state to you distinctly the principle I refer to; a dependent being (and a creature is a dependent being, or a revolted one, perhaps a revolted dependent one), but a dependent being is elevated by its wants, not by its powers. Its powers may develop it, but cannot elevate it. But if I have a want, which is not power, and there is that which meets my want outside myself, I become acquainted with it. I appreciate it, not by power, but by dependence on the quality by which my want is supplied. Hunger is not power, but it enjoys and appropriates food which gives power. Weakness is not power, but if my languid body leans on kindly and supporting strength, my felt weakness makes me know what strength is. But I learn more by it. I learn the kindness, patience, goodness, readiness, help, and perseverance in helping which sustain me. I have the experience of independent strength, adapted, suited, to my weakness. I know its capacity to sustain what is beyond itself, which is not my power elevating itself in internal development, self-filling power. There is love. Now this relationship of wants to that which supplies them in another, is the link between my nature and all the qualities of the nature I lean on, and which supplies these wants. I know its qualities by the way it meets my not having them, my want of power. It is a moral link, too. I know love by it, and all the unfolding of goodness ; self-power never does. The exaltation of what is human in itself is the positive loss of what is Divine, that is infinite, positive loss. There is immense moral depth in the apostle's word : When I am weak, then am I strong. And the more I have of God, and the more absolutely it is so, the more I gain. All is appropriated, but self is destroyed. It is not that I cease to exist, or to enjoy. It is not a Buddhist or stoical pantheistic absorption into God. I am always the conscious I, for ever ; but an I which does not think of I, but of God, in whom its delight is. It is a wonderful perfection—an absolute delight in what is perfect, but in what is perfect out of ourselves, so that self is morally annihilated, though it always is there personally to enjoy. This is partly now in the form of thirst, though there be enjoyment. Hereafter, for those who have it, perfect enjoyment face to face. God alone is sufficient for himself, is αυταρκης, and hence not self-seeking, for that comes from not being satisfied, not sufficient for self. Out of Him the αυταρχεια is pride, is satisfaction with misery and itself a sin—dependence the right, holy, loving, excellent place. To be independent, if we are not God, is folly, stupidity, and a lie, living in a lie. If we are God, we must be the only one, or we are it not at all. Yet in Christianity we are made partakers of the Divine nature, in order to our having the fullest capacity of enjoyment ; but for that very reason have, He being perfectly revealed, such a knowledge of him as makes us undividedly delight in his infinite excellence, and makes our dependence to be our deriving in love from infinite excellence, and in our normal state unmingled delight in it. The connection of the derivative and perfect objective character of Divine life and love, is what is so brought out in John, particularly in his epistle ; it makes its essential depth and beauty, and when not seized, because not possessed, its difficulty and apparently mystic character. It is this which makes the Trinity have so sure and perfect a place to the soul. I do not use this as a proof, save as the real present enjoyment of anything proves to the heart it is true. In the Father I have absolute Godhead in its own intrinsic permanent perfection. In the Son, I find what is Divine (if not in the same perfection, I have not God revealed) brought out in man, fully wrought into all that is sinlessly human ; so that it is not only suited to man, but to be apprehended (if morally capable of it) by man. All the fulness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily, at the same time in the personal relationship of Son ; and the Holy Ghost, besides my having a life from God, and so being partaker of the Divine nature, is the power in me, (morally as well as in power of apprehension,) by which I apprehend and enter into communion with God, with the Father and the Son. While this presence of the Holy Ghost secures in my feebleness the truth and purity of this communion, because any inconsistency grieves him, and He works in the conscience by the revelation of God, though not then in communion.

Now you must see that there is much that must be directly revealed in such subjects as these. Even of what is bodily brought before us, as in the life of Jesus on earth, though in itself a revelation, an account of it is needed, not only to perpetuate it—which is quite true—but also to give a Divine view of the thing revealed, which it is evident man by sight would have hardly seized in its full extent or bearings ; or could not in its links with other unseen or unknown things. But besides this, we want a Divine account of what is short of the revelation of God himself to man ; namely, a revelation of the terms on which man stood with him, and of his ways with man. This will involve man's imperfection, and if historically given, the expression of that imperfection, but will be God's account of it.

W. Yes ; but it is just when we get on this ground that there are difficulties and objections which perplex the mind. Difficulties, I mean, both as to the record of truth, and as to the moral proprieties of evangelical truths.

H. I do not deny it, not that I judge they are very weighty; but as to the first point, it does not surprise me, that in a record which reaches over some fifteen hundred years or more, committed to the care of man, for that it professes to be, I should find the traces of the infirmity of man, while its state in those circumstances, and its whole history, is the most striking possible proof of the providence of God. It is of the essence of a revelation made in grace, to be adapted to man, connected with man, to pass through the medium of man's moral nature, and be put, so to speak, into his hands. It could not draw the sympathies of his nature in the same way if it did not. It would not associate man with God—not connect God and man in interests, affections, moral nature—give a common ground of moral association, if it did not. Hence the New Testament does it much more than the Old—is more familiar, more human, takes its place more in every element of human circumstances. In the Old, after the revelation of the creation as a starting-point, and sphere of God's manifestation by and in man, I find history as to which I am left to judge morally; most instructive history, if I know how to use it; but a public government of this world, or occasional relationships between God and man, in which I have to form a spiritual judgment how far men are up to the height of a true association with God. For the true link was not yet formed by the full revelation of God in grace, only a partial revelation of it anticipatively, and particular communications; and God dwelt in the thick darkness; then oracular dicta, a "Thus saith the Lord." God shewing grace, speaking to man, but speaking himself alone. No doubt by the mouth of man, His word using them so as to approach man in sovereign goodness where man had failed. The word of the Lord came to such a one, it is said. But it was as an instrument, a channel of communication, so that they searched out the meaning of their own prophecies. In the New, I find a history of perfection; for God is manifest in the flesh. It is not communications from a God not revealed, but the revelation of God. Hence it is perfect, on His part, in that association of which I spoke. It is the Word made flesh. God in man moving in the circumstances of men amongst men, and is not what I have to judge of spiritually in man, but the perfection which judges all else; the truth, an object, which, if I have a heart capable of seeing it and loving it, engages it absolutely, because it is God, because it is man, because it is God in man, and I am a man; the perfect object linking itself with every moral delight of my new nature, meeting at the same time every want of my moral being, in perfect grace; finding in those wants, yea, even in my sins, the occasion of manifesting grace to it, of making me know God by them, at least by the perception of the way He meets them in love. It forms and fills the capacities of my nature in what is Divine, as beauty does a capacity to perceive it. Yet it meets all my wants with good, which puts man in his right place of dependence, in grace, on God; but gives entire confidence, because He is come as myself, as far as being a man, in every thing but what is a defect in man; that is, sin. He is that by which I judge everything, not which I have to judge as a history of man, though it be of man in various relationships with God. Besides, I have in the New Testament another immensely important element of our relationship with God. This blessed One was rejected. Such is the history we have. It is the full discovery of this solemn truth, that the carnal mind is enmity against God. And the other part of the New Testament, is the unfolding of the way in which, through God's being sovereign in love over man's evil, He has, in the perfect display of righteousness, been able, glorifying himself perfectly in the work of Christ in the putting away of evil, to associate man in his new nature with himself, out of the reach of the evil, and according to his own perfection; where the feebleness and the misery will and can exist no longer. Thus a perfect heavenly relationship is formed, ourselves holy and without blame before him in love, and his own children in his house, associated with, and like him who became a man for us in grace. To this is added, the various exercises accompanying the knowledge and faith of this in weakness, and the fitting display of the fruits of it, in those partakers of this life, in connection with heaven, but in the weakness of an earthly vessel. This display of the Divine in man, and the bringing man up to God in his own blessedness, form the contents of the New Testament. We may add, the setting the world right ultimately, in peace, by the Divine government in man. What I have just remarked, if you examine it a little closely, you will find to be the difference between the writings of Paul and John, and the reason of the special attractiveness of the writings of the latter. John brings God down in man to earth. It is the Divine down here, and it is the perfection of loveliness and truth. Paul brings man out of the earth and up to heaven. You will see that, save in casual allusions necessarily made, or complementary to the main subject, John never takes even Christ up to heaven. He brings the Divine person down here in human kindness, diffusing what is perfectly divine into the hearts of men that can receive him, through his own person, and at any rate manifesting it among them. And hence too it is, that it was John's part to go on to the Apocalypse, because though in certain respects on much lower ground, inasmuch as it is the government of the world, it is still the display of God's ways and character on the earth.

W. This to me, though thus briefly sketched, is profoundly interesting. But what place do the Psalms hold in this view of the character of the Old and New Testaments?

H. I was going to say a word on them; they have their own and a very peculiar place. We have no devotional pieces prepared for the Church in the New Testament, which gives this point more importance, and I think additionally shews the grace of God, and the perfect and Divine harmony of that book we call the Bible. I say, that book; for though there be many authors instrumentally, it is one book—our Bibliotheca Sancta, as Jerome says.

In the New Testament, the saints having the knowledge of perfect Divine favour, the love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the Holy Ghost given to them, and that blessed Spirit dwelling in them, are supposed to be capable of praising God freely. It is expressed in a very wonderful manner in the twenty-second Psalm. After giving prophetic utterance to the sorrows of Christ, and his being forsaken of God, He is heard from the horns of the unicorns. As soon as He enters into the full light of his Father's countenance, according to the power of redemption and the work that He had wrought, He declares his Father's name, as He thus knows it, to his brethren, puts them as He is in relationship with the Father. As He historically did: "Go tell my brethren,.....I go to my Father and your Father, to my God and your God." This was a position entirely new, consequent upon his resurrection, in which He had not only taken a new place as man, but acquired it for them. Then in the Psalm, He says, "In the midst of the Church I will sing praise unto thee." Our praises then are the free and joyful following of Christ in the praises which He can raise, as man, in entering into the full light of his Father's countenance, according to the work He has wrought. But this could not be till perfect and intimate love was revealed to man, and men were brought, according to a righteous exercise of it, into the enjoyment of the light of God's countenance, according to the value of that work which had given them the title to be there. Hence, if I should find the same perfection portrayed in the Old Testament as in the New, I should know it was not true. Before the revelation of God himself, and our being brought on a new footing into his presence, that is, in the Old Testament, the dealings of God with man, on the moral condition in which he was as a child of Adam, are unfolded. God never leaving himself without witness, for He is good, but for a time without an express revelation; afterwards with one of promise or of law, and the moral nature of man wrought in by hopes, fears, promises, warnings, judgments, and mercies. In a word, God was dealing with man on the ground of man's responsibility, and trying the effect of motives. Could man, in flesh walking on the earth, be in relationship with God? It was not God himself revealed, and man reconciled to him according to his unclouded heavenly character, but God governing the earth in mercy and righteousness, and man's moral condition tested thereby. On the one hand wickedness and self-will breaking forth, and where there was really grace, failure no doubt, but, faith in God, confidence, hope, integrity, acknowledgment of sin, dependence on, and delighting in him, in spite of all. But man, not being reconciled to God, knows God only by his ways, and a word adapted to man in this outside position. How, with failure and conscious sin, could that confidence be maintained, without which no heart-link could exist? If reconciled, where the Spirit of adoption is, where by one offering we are perfected for ever, praise is easy and spontaneous, though acknowledgment of failure be called for. If repeated sacrifices give momentary ease, yet even these were the witness that sin still subsisted. The way into the holiest was not yet made manifest ; nor was God revealed outside it. He was a God of hope, not of communion. Here the Psalms, in the most gracious and lovely way, find their place, not the peaceful breathings of a reconciled soul, but God furnishing the true but tried soul with divinely given, and therefore surely accepted expressions, of every feeling which a soul in such a state could need to express, and the witness of the entire sympathy of the Spirit of Christ in all their sorrows and exercises of heart. To be perfect, man must be within—children in a new accepted state. But for the heart divinely quickened, and exercised without, wishing, hoping, fearing, confiding, yet tried, guilty, sometimes almost despairing, yet still clinging, the Spirit of Jehovah puts his word in the tongue of the Psalmist, to give a Divine utterance to otherwise a perhaps distrusted feeling, or to draw the heart from a feeling of distrust : and the Psalms become the comfort of every tried and godly soul. Hence it is that, as the expression of a soul tried in the present dark government of this world, the judgment and destruction of enemies in this world is looked for : a judgment which must take place for the power of evil to be removed by government out of it. The Christian has nothing to do with that, because he is entirely associated with heaven, enters within the veil by a new and living way, and will leave the evil, to go to heaven, and is above it morally all his life long. Hence the thoughts and feelings of spiritual minds in the Old Testament must be imperfect. They are the fruit of grace, giving confidence to the soul when yet far from God, and the expression of its feelings at that distance, and according to the state it finds itself in, looking to God in and out of that. And all this I must have to know what the true condition of the human heart is, looked at in its exercised responsible position out of paradise, man with a knowledge of good and evil ; the goodness and righteousness of God as regards that state revealed to him, and all the various workings of his nature under this, with the promise of a better deliverance to come. Christianity is another thing altogether; exercises there are, no doubt, but they are the exercises of a reconciled soul, which has its place and dwelling with God, known himself in love.

W. But you do not feign that Old Testament saints looked only for temporal promises?

H. I do not. I do not doubt that, according to the measure of their faith, though they did look for the exercise of God's government for deliverance here, yet in the delay of this, they looked out of it all to a better place, though obscurely enough. But this changes nothing. They looked to it as a resource out of a scene they belonged to. The Christian dwells in it if in his right place, and has to cultivate the affections which belong to his Father's house as his own home. You will remark that I do not merely mean that in result Old Testament feelings are imperfect, for that may well be said of ours; but that the basis of them, the moral sphere in which they moved, necessarily made them imperfect; they were not in place, if they were not. God might inspire feelings right for those without,—hope, desire, confidence; but He could not truly inspire to those without the feelings which expressed being within, for those feelings would not have been true. My feelings, if right, are the feelings of one within in my Father's house as a known home, reconciled to God. Theirs, if right, were those of persons without, looking for the present government of this world, and confiding in God in spite of subsisting evil in a world to which they belonged. He that is of the earth is earthy, says the greatest born of woman, and speaketh of the earth: He that cometh from heaven is above all; and what He has seen and heard that He testifieth.

W. I think I understand you; but it was very great grace God's entering into the very sorrows and condition of an earthly people, at least, by his Spirit and Word, furnishing them with assurances of his faithfulness, and expressions for a heart which could not speak as at peace, reconciled, and within, and yet needed the sense and sustaining of favour: Yet, of course, it is better to have affections which belong to the house developed within as children of the house. It gives a wonderfully interesting and enlarged scope of thought in reading Scripture, and makes God more familiar with the soul as truly estimating and dealing with its thoughts. But these saints will be in heaven ?

H. Doubtless, they will. They received that Divine nature which has its place there, but not in the conscious heavenly relationship formed on known redemption. God had reserved some better thing for us, that they without us should not be made perfect. They will be made perfect in resurrection ; but what a lesson shall we have learnt,—aye, will the angels have learnt, of the ways and dealings and goodness of God, and, instead of that miserable αυταρχεια which was the heathen's boast, what a moulding of a thousand excellent feelings through dependence on God, in the midst of evil and in the sense of imperfection, which He met by his word as a resource for faith. How tender and familiar, while exalting his Majesty by goodness, God thus becomes. Yet it was right we should understand that by a perfect sacrifice we could in a new nature enjoy God as He is in himself, and that is our Christian place. This is what the apostle unfolds in its elements in Rom. v. Justified, for it must be a divinely righteous thing, or it is not really introduction to God's nature, we have peace with God ; as regards all evil the question is settled ; grace or favour wherein we stand ; our hope that of the glory of God himself. These, you would say, are all. Yes, as regards my place, but not my exercises of heart. "Not only so, but we glory in tribulations," not looking out of them merely in hope, but glory in them as a refining work, because the love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the Holy Ghost given to us, and I have the key to all my sorrows. God's love is the joy of my heart. Hence, again, not only so, but I joy in God, through our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom we have now received the reconciliation.

W. It makes rationalism and infidelity appear very superficial.

H. There is nothing more characteristic of it than superficiality. It never gets beyond the bark and shell of the Divine fruit of the Word. In the midst of the most admirable development of Divine ways, it will stop to complain that the numberings of Israel and Judah are not the same in Samuel and Chronicles. How, they ask me, do you account for that? Suppose I answer, I cannot account for it at all. I should not be a bit the worse off. I have a positive proof of perfect Divine wisdom in the book and in all its details, for these details give to the whole the character it has. Man's estimate of things, partly influenced by the Spirit of God, his thoughts, his feelings, the evil, the rebellions, the faults, the unbelief, the way God met it,—all go to make up the picture of what man was before God, and the scene of God's dealings in mercy and truth with men, till, as it is expressed, mercy and truth meet together, and righteousness and peace kiss each other. Every detail lost, would be a loss of the completeness. Some trait would fail of these wonderful unfoldings of what man is in relationship with God. Suppose my intelligence of some of the details fails me, that I cannot account for some phenomenon, I lose something, of course. The proofs of the completeness, the dealings of God, however, have not disappeared. I cannot (I suppose the case) explain some particular point, nor solve an apparent discrepancy in a number. I pity the person whose perception of the perfection of all is hindered by a difficulty he cannot explain. To my mind, the greatest part of these difficulties are the fruit of the ignorance and traditional views of the objectors. This volume proves it. I may not be able to solve, God may try our faith by some such things, through the human weakness of those to whom these Divine oracles were entrusted, but He will always answer and bless our faith.

W. Have you any case on your mind ?

H. I judge that superficiality is universally characteristic of rationalist views, but I will allude to one prominent subject with them. Before I heard of rationalists I had, as others no doubt, clearly seen the Petrine, and Pauline, and Johannean characters into which parts of the Divine revelation were thrown. The beauty and moral harmony, the goodness of God in this, the enormous gain and advantage to us, which fill the believer's mind, they have not the smallest perception of. They can only spell out possible historical inconsistencies, and think of the books as the fruit of some ecclesiastical intrigues to reconcile Christian factions, or give the authority of apostolic names to cover resistance to heresies come in long after. That God in perfect love to man should give, in one, instruction how far the Christian, redeemed from the world, should, as a pilgrim in it, be connected with its government by God as more directly displayed in the Old Testament, as Peter does ; that the blessed revelation of God himself, as it is expressed, No man hath seen God at any time, the only begotten Son, who is in the bosom of the Father, He hath declared Him, and of eternal life in Him in all its nature and qualities should be given in John ; and man presented to God in righteousness and resurrection, and conferred privileges in heaven, be developed in Paul : all this is lost on them. They are trying to prove it imposture, or reconcile dates, or discuss the possible author, provided no one pretend it to be genuine. There is an incapacity to perceive the Divine which is difficult to conceive. Yet I believe it is useful. Happily the most advanced of these wise men are so entirely unhistorical, that they have no credit with sober minds, even those who are not much affected by the Divine.

English theologians are so shut up in traditional love, that they think rationalists have upset all inspiration, if they overthrow their own traditions. Just as a poor Roman Catholic turns infidel often, if he comes to think a bit of bread is not the body; blood, soul, and divinity of the Lord Jesus. Thus our essayists tell us as a great discovery, that no man can now suppose that the tower of Babel was built to be high enough to escape the flood; a puerile conceit of which there is not a trace in the scriptural account, but an immense moral historical fact. Their declared object was to make themselves a name, have a centre, which should hinder their being scattered abroad upon the face of the whole earth. It was centralization, not with God for a centre; but to combine the whole race in one system of united power. This God confounded, and made them into nations, which they had never been before at all. This immense fact in the history of the world they see nothing of, and think they have made a great discovery which upsets the Scripture account, in shewing that it could not be to escape the flood. "No doubt they are the men, and wisdom shall die with them." We get in this part of Scripture the two great elements on which all the world has proceeded since,—nationalities, and individual ambitions seizing imperial power. But you must never trust the statements of this class of persons as to anything. There is the greatest pretension to new light, and some very questionable hypothesis of a moment is stated as a settled ascertained fact, with a coolness which is a mark of want of the honesty of a conscience fearing God. In these Essays and Reviews there are statements which are a disgrace to any upright or honest man,—Jesuitical to a degree which is sufficient to destroy all moral confidence in one who could have such sentiments ; the publication of which proves that those who publish them are arrived at a point of moral insensibility at which they have lost the sense of shame in making their shame known. They are not aware how bad it is.

W. But this is rather strong language.

H. To be sure it is ; there are acts and traits which, if they do not excite indignation, one is a partaker in morally. What do you say to this :—

“ It is stated to be the affirming, that any of the Thirty-nine Articles are in any part ‘superstitious or erroneous.’ Yet an article may be very inexpedient, or become so ; may be unintelligible, or not easily intelligible to ordinary people ; it may be controversial, and such as to provoke controversy and keep it alive when otherwise it would subside ; it may revive unnecessarily the remembrance of dead controversies—all or any of these, without being ‘erroneous ;’ and though not ‘superstitious,’ some expressions may appear so ; such as those which seem to impute an occult operation to the sacraments.”

“ The other canon which concerns subscription is the thirty-sixth, which contains two clauses explanatory, to some extent, of the meaning of ministerial subscription, ‘That he alloweth the Book of Articles,’ &c., and ‘that he acknowledgeth the same to be agreeable to the Word of God.’ We ‘allow’ many things which we do not think wise or practically useful ; as the less of two evils, or an evil which cannot be remedied, or of which the remedy is not attainable, or is uncertain in its operation, or is not in our power, or concerning which there is much difference of opinion, or where the initiation of any change does not belong to ourselves, either of the things as they are, or of searching for something better. Many acquiesce in, submit to, ‘allow,’ a law as it operates upon themselves which they would be horror-struck to have enacted ; yet they would gladly and in conscience, ‘allow’ and submit to it, as part of a constitution under which they live, against which they would never think of rebelling, which they would on no account undermine, for the many blessings of which they are fully grateful—they would be silent and patient rather than join, even in appearance, the disturbers and breakers of its laws. Secondly, he ‘acknowledgeth’ to be agreeable to the Word of God. Some distinctions may be founded upon the word ‘acknowledge.’ He does not maintain, nor regard it as self-evident, nor originate it as his own feeling, spontaneous opinion, or conviction ; but when it is suggested to him, put in a certain shape, when the intention of the framers is borne in mind, their probable purpose and design explained, together with the difficulties which surrounded them, he is not prepared to contradict, and he acknowledges. There is a great deal to be said, which had not at first occurred to him; many other better and wiser men than himself have acknowledged the same thing—why should he be obstinate? Besides, he is young, and has plenty of time to reconsider it; or he is old, and continues to submit out of habit, and it would be too absurd, at his time of life, to be setting up as a church reformer.”

“We have spoken hitherto of the signification of subscription which may be gathered from the canons; there is, also, a statute, a law of the land, which forbids, under penalties, the advisedly and directly contradicting any of them by ecclesiastics, and requires subscription with declaration of “assent” from beneficed persons. This statute (13 Eliz. c. 12), three hundred years old, like many other old enactments, is not found to be very applicable to modern cases; although it is only about fifty years that it was said by Sir William Scott to be in viridi observantia. Nevertheless, its provisions would not easily be brought to bear on questions likely to be raised in our own days. The meshes are too open for modern refinements. For not to repeat concerning the word “assent” what has been said concerning “allow” and “acknowledge,” let the Articles be taken according to an obvious classification. Forms of expression, partly derived from modern modes of thought on metaphysical subjects, partly suggested by a better acquaintance than heretofore with the unsettled state of Christian opinion in the immediately post-apostolic age, may be adopted with respect to the doctrines enunciated in the five first Articles without directly contradicting, impugning, or refusing assent to them, but passing by the side of them—as with respect to the humanifying of the Divine Word and to the Divine Personalities.”—Essays and Reviews. pp. 182—186.

And remark here, this does not refer to minute discrepancies of view which are often connected with the very structure of individual mind where there is no real difference in substance. It is directly referred to the fundamental doctrines of the incarnation and the persons in the Trinity; as to this they justify signing your assent, meaning that you do not agree, but pass by the side of them. Now I say, that a person who could unblushingly avow such opinions does not deserve to be heard on any moral question whatever.

W. But you cannot charge them all with the views of one.

H. Not of course as to details, but when they agree to appear together, and bind up their articles in a common volume to act together on the public mind, by a common testimony, they are practically associated. I admit, not in details of opinions, but in the general purport and moral aim and character of the book. And I do say, that such pages as 182—186 put them out of court as to their title to be heard on Divine things.

W. They are very bad, in truth.

H. We will leave that, though to my mind it is not an evil that the minds of all who believe in the revelation God has given should know where the system of rationalism leads morally,—at any rate, when it is attempted to be connected with established Christianity.

W. What were you saying as to the tendency you had observed on the Continent?

H. We have indeed had a long preface, but the perfect beauty of Scripture leads me on.

W. It is no loss to have had this much. I believe that the positive perception of the excellency and beauty of what is true and good is the best security against cavil and difficulties. These difficulties take their right proportion and their right place. The truth is divinely certain. And there are difficulties, not objections.

H. Surely, and the difference is of all-importance. A person who makes an objection out of a difficulty proves the spirit he is animated with, especially when the thing he objects against is supremely lovely. He shews himself incapable of judging. Either he does not perceive the loveliness, or he dislikes it. But what you refer to was this, an effort to popularize, in France as well as England, the infidel conclusions drawn from German research. I bought a translation of Job by a first-rate oriental scholar in France, not heeding his opinions, but hoping to find some profound examination of the text. I found in his introduction merely the assumption, that all the German infidelity was a conceded matter, and putting it into plain French. This is just what the Essays and Reviews are attempting. Now where there is Divine faith, this does not do much ; but the mass may have educational faith in the Scriptures, so that they are respected as true, and have a hold on the conscience. They cannot have by this, the proof that the believer has, that the word has divinely reached his own conscience. But when the confidence of those who are believers in the Word as such, by habit and education merely, is gone, you have to begin further back in the matter ; the population are tending to apostacy, not mere heart unbelief ; and that is what Satan is seeking to do now. It is not the open, honest denial of the old Deist, against which the claims of a denied Christianity, raised with most, a rampart in the conscience too strong to be overcome ; but the keeping up the name and garb of Christianity, and blunting its edge, and undermining its foundations, so that what is of God in it may be wholly given up, and the authority of God's word over the conscience gone ; for if it be God's word, it has absolute authority. A man that would speak of Shakspeare having authority over my conscience would be a fool. They may parade human inspiration, and compare degrees of it. God's authority is wholly gone, and man is free in the perversion of his will. Shakspeare never made a saint. Modern infidelity will allow Christianity as much as you please, provided Christ be, as another, a minister to elevate humanity as it is, comes in in his own place as one eminent instrument, and man, I, be all. I maintain the authority of God's word because it is God's, that man is lost in himself, and that God has appeared. Owned, we possess him in blessing ; rejected, we are his self-condemned enemies. I maintain redemption, which brings man out of the condition he was in, into another new and blessed one before God, according to his own righteousness and holiness. I do not want humanity educated, but God known.

W. I see you have finished your preface, at any rate, and that your zeal has landed you at Rugby. Let us hear what you have to say of Dr. Temple.

H. I am sure you will excuse my zeal. I have not an unkindly feeling, that I am conscious of, towards a living being; but when I see what is divinely perfect, and good, and revered, flippantly assailed, I have no wish to exhibit indifference: and when men jeopard the faith of millions, as far as their acts are concerned, when they treat with a light hand the Lord of glory, and the authority of his words, they merit scornful rebuke for what they do, if even its execution be pretentious and superficial.

Such, whatever my feebleness in showing it may be, is the judgment I have formed of these Essays and Reviews. They are mischievous, not by their depth and seriousness, for they are neither deep nor serious: but as a spark that falls among shavings in a warehouse filled with oil. I agree with two Irish Archbishops, that they are dishonest, and with an English one, that they are very feeble. But let us examine Dr. Temple on the education of the world.

The first thing that strikes me is, that there is no glimpse or appearance of a thought of anything in man, but of the lower part of man—of man arriving as a race, at a certain result down here in this world. God and a soul in connexion with him are altogether shut out. Supposing, what I do not believe, a succession of races, beginning and running through the same career in a succession of cycles, this would render, Dr. Temple tells us, the existence of each one of them unnecessary: the annihilation of a whole human race is absolutely nothing. Now, as to progress in this world, or a development of man, as man merely, that is quite true. But what about the relationship of the souls which compose the race with God?—Is that nothing? Or is that under the iron rule of a cycle which leads to no result? The supposition leaves out altogether every relationship between God and the soul. Redemption being an infinite thing in its nature, I do not believe there can be a repetition of such cycles, because I believe the second man is the last Adam. Of course, this Christian Doctor and instructor of youth does not trouble himself about redemption in his education of the world, nor will I here insist upon it; but if there were uniform cycles, and the result of each the same as to the public result, as to humanity in this world; the difference might be infinite as to everything of the highest nature in man, unless man is morally an absolute slave to the circumstances through which he passes. To say nothing of redemption, that is, God's actings about men, which makes the whole theory of the education of the world nonsense. The whole reasoning of Dr. T. excludes the idea of God and a soul.

W. Excuse me; he speaks of the effect on the souls of men in the second paragraph of his paper.

H. To be sure he does, and this is the clearest proof of what I say, and that it is true in the most offensive way. He says, that on the supposition of his uniform cycles, the lives and souls of men become so indifferent, that the annihilation of a whole human race, or of many such races, is absolutely nothing. Now this makes the soul of man absolutely nothing, but for a result of progress in this world. It goes so far that the soul's non-existence after death is absolutely indifferent; for their annihilation is nothing, if progressive result as a race is not induced. And supposing the soul were not immortal, and were annihilated after death, the progress of the race could go on just as well; the succeeding generation would inherit the progress of the preceding, and go on towards the ultimate result. Those that were dead need not exist at all for that.

W. Yes, my friend, but there is an aspect of this you have not considered ; it may be alleged that the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is necessary for this progress.

H. Excuse me, my dear W. I have considered it. Either the doctrine of the immortality of the soul is true, or it is not. (And the doctrine itself proves the doctrine true). If it be not true, I have, on the supposition you make of its being used, an imposture which involves considerations leaving this poor world and its progress in the shade of nothingness, used for the sole purpose of leading the race to progress, as its result, a use which makes the immortality absolutely nothing—which is really as absurd as it is false and dishonest ; or immortality and the all-important considerations which accompany it are true ; and they make the progress of the race a mere accident, comparatively, and all Dr. Temple's views miserably false, to the shame of one who could have held them. No, he has a world without souls, and souls without God.

W. I see you have considered it, and what you say is true. It is evident that this system ignores, or worse, God, and all the higher parts and relationships of man.

H. But it is as intrinsically feeble as it is morally low. His statement is, "Now, that the individual man is capable of perpetual or almost perpetual development, from the day of his birth to the day of his death, is obvious, of course." If he had said development, and decay, and extinction, (that is, as far as this world goes,) he would have been right, but that would not have served his purpose—a cycle of education of the race which ended in decay and extinction is a poor kind of progress. Yet this enters essentially into the condition of man. The sense that he is mortal is a necessary part of his moral existence. A Christian knows it has come in by sin ; that it is a silent, yet loud-speaking witness of it, and of God's judgment against it. But is the education of the world to end in its progressive death, as well as the rest of its development? If not, the analogy is wholly false, for this is as real and true a part of the course of the individual as his growth from childhood.

W. It is true. I suppose, however, Dr. T. does not consider the world as arrived at its dotage.

H. No; of course, all the world were infants or boys till now. Now the human race is left to itself, to be guided by the teaching of the Spirit within.

W. The human race! Is he a quaker, then?

H. Oh, you must not look for anything like exactitude of thought in drawing-room rationalists. That the mass of men are heathens is all nothing, or that the Bible, of which they profess to be teachers, declares as one of its most solemn truths, that the Spirit is given to those that belong to Christ. To speculation, heathenism, or Christianity is all alike. It is an element of progress of the human race. You must not be so particular as that. You must believe that the human race is left to itself, to be guided by the teaching of the Spirit within.

W. Well, but there is a revelation. Surely Christianity is something. Do they believe that the Son of God is come to seek and to save what is lost?

H. Oh! that is part of the progress—one of the things you can sign your assent to as agreeable to the Scriptures, and pass by the side of. It is “humanifying the Divine Word.”

W. Now don't be bitter. That is not Dr. Temple.

H. It is not; but it is one with whom Dr. Temple, the head-master of Rugby, has associated himself, and given his weight to, in the hope that it will be received as an attempt to illustrate the advantage derivable to the cause of religion and moral truth, ‘from a free handling, in a becoming spirit, of subjects peculiarly liable to suffer by the repetition of conventional language, and from traditional methods of treatment.’ You see, however independent of each other, it is a Band of Hope Review. They approve of each other, they consider the articles as handled in a becoming spirit, though evidently some were a little squeamish in doing it. But we will go on with Dr. Temple.

Man, he tells us, cannot be considered as an individual.

This is a most startling but instructive statement, which I must take up, though I have touched upon it. Note, his soul is individual, his responsibility is individual, his moral state is individual, his feelings are individual, his conscience is individual. All that is elevated, excellent, and that raises him above the common stream of passions, is individual. All that constitutes him a moral being, all the inward man, all in which he is personally related to God, everything that does not perish with his death : and all is ignored, cannot be considered, by Dr. Temple. He is part of a great machine formed by the influences around him, that is all. Neither is he morally individual in himself, according to Dr. Temple ; nor raised to be so by a known relationship to God. And this leaks out further on. In speaking of the elements of progress, he says, "The conviction of the unity and spirituality of God was peculiar to the Jews, among the pioneers of civilization." Think of the unity and spirituality of God, or at any rate the conviction of it, making men simply the pioneers of future civilization.

Dr. T. argues that a child, brought up from its birth apart from its kind, becomes rather a beast in human shape, than a man in the full sense at all.

If he used this merely to shew that God had so constituted man, that he should learn intelligently from others, and not grow up as animals with a mere instinct, I suppose he needed not have feared much opposition ; but when he uses it to shew that man cannot be individually considered, it is utterly illogical. That man learns from others does not prove in the least that he is not a responsible individual when he does learn. Dr. Temple's statement destroys totally the whole moral responsibility of man.

That there is progress in knowledge, in civilization, up to a certain point in man's development as a race, is partially true. That a part of the race has been placed under progressive religious light is also true. But that that is the obliteration of individuality, or individual responsibility in and according to that state, is utterly and degradingly false.

If the education at Rugby were necessary to enable a man to go up to Oxford, does that prove he cannot be considered an individual when he is gone up? But all is so carefully generalized as to be false the moment we apply it to facts. Thus Dr. T. says, "We may expect to find in the history of man, each successive age incorporating into itself the substance of the preceding." Now I suppose no intelligent person would deny, that where European civilization has prevailed, the acquirements of one age become, in many points, that is when discoveries are concerned, the elements of the next. Every child who learns astronomy learns the Newtonian, or if you please, the Copernican system, not the Ptolemaic. But when you say the history of man, it is entirely false. The vastly greater part of the human race remain in statu quo. The Chinese are not more advanced than they were centuries ago. Nor indeed, may we say, any of the Asiatic nations, that is, the greatest part by far of the population of the globe. Indeed, they have in many respects retrograded. None of the Africans have advanced; on the contrary, there also they have fearfully retrograded. In America, Europeans have supplanted the native population, but there has been no advance save in the conquerors. It is a question if Mexico and Peru be as civilized as when Aztecs and Tezcucans possessed the country of Anahuac, and Incas exercised their mild despotism as the legitimate descendants of the sun. There has been a history of man in these races that have come in connection with the despised people of God, but no where else. Somehow or other, the people whose records rationalism delights to call in question, are the necessary centre, and, I may say, foundation of all known history. The mind of man may speculate with interest on other histories, the ruins of Nineveh, and the hundred-gated Thebes, and Babylon may furnish evidence for antiquaries to build dynasties and histories on; but a documented history of those early days, belongs to Israel only. It may of course be attacked, and conjectures hazarded to disprove it, as they may be hazarded to make kings out of tombs, and centuries out of priestly traditions; but in Israel alone are the documents there to be disproved. In this history only do we find the principles which Dr. T. speaks of as the true education of man. We will speak afterwards of the influence of Greeks and Romans on the present age and education of man, but they have nothing to do with his analogy of educational epochs, which are the law, Christ, and the Spirit: for of course we must decently Christianize everything, that is, reduce Christianity to the level of man and his progress. And this introduces another immensely important point, carefully suppressed by Dr. T. in his account of this progress of man. I mean, the fact of revelation. He speaks of the progress of man; but the facts in which the progress is estimated are, really, exclusively, revelations and interventions of God. He says, "First, the law, then the Son of Man, then the gift of the Spirit." Is this progress essential to a spiritual being? Is this each generation receiving the benefits of the cultivation of that which preceded it?

But let us consider the facts. However he may borrow the principles of his education of the human race from Scripture, except to array himself in these borrowed plumes, revelation is totally ignored and all it contains. If there has been a fall, the progress of the human race, ~~save~~ in its lower aspects, comes to nothing at once. We are fallen beings ; there is a guilty soul before God ; the whole scene is one departed from and out of the condition He set it in. It is in progress in what, then ? It wants, and wants individually, and in every way, restoration,—progress in its highest relationship. Christianity, and all the revelation from which the head master of Rugby quotes his principles of progress, treats man as in this state of alienation from God. It is false, or the theory is false. The law was given, but broken. The Son of Man in the world, but rejected out of it by man, and a work of redemption revealed for a being not in progress, but lost. I reserve the consideration of what thought that man must have of God, who, looking at this world's universal state, does not believe in the fall of man.

But further, as to the world's history. The flood has taken place, so the Old Testament teaches, so the Lord declares, as Peter warns that it is by wilful ignorance it is forgotten. But if the flood has taken place, the whole race has been judged once, and judged for the progress it had made. That judgment will, it is true, not be repeated, but the now world is reserved for fire. At what point of progress will that come ? Has Dr. T. ever heard of days in which mockers will be, who say, Where is the promise of his coming ? for all things continue as they were ; of perilous times that will come, in which the Scripture will be the resource of the faithful who continue in the things they have learned ? But I am wrong to reason on Scripture with them, as if they believed it. Let us take their own system as they take it up professedly from Scripture. That I am not unjust in charging them with ignoring this mighty dealing of God with the world, which, while keeping the place they do, they have not the honest boldness to deny, while introducing what sets it aside, you may easily see. Dr. T.'s words are these : "The education of this early race may strictly be said to begin when it was formed into the various masses out of which the nations of the earth have sprung. The world, as it were, went to school, and was broken up into classes." Now that refers to the confusion of tongues at Babel. You would suppose, that, before this Rugby education of the race when a wise master began to deal with and educate it, in order that there might be some hope of the race's turning out well, it had been, as yet, nurtured in the graceful affections and first confiding impressions of the home of its childhood. Alas! no. It was a world outcast from God, so bad that He had to destroy it. The childhood of man before it went to school, according to Dr. T., was violence, and that followed by sensuality, fallen or not. But the flood—no trace of it is found. We are told, that the earliest commands almost entirely refer to bodily appetites and sensual passions. This may suit the theory, because they have to be corrected as children, but is otherwise a dream. There is no command before the flood, and after it the one declaration is, "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." It appears that wilfulness of temper, germs of wanton cruelty, characterize childhood, and are easily corrected by a mother; but here there was no education, no wise educator. The Governor of the world left the childhood of man to itself, to run into wanton violence unrestrained, to perfect its evil education without any restraint at all. This was a singular system of the education of the human race. "Each generation receiving the benefit of the cultivation of that which precedes it." "The easily corrected cruelty was here," we are told, "developed into a prevailing plague of wickedness." Now let the reader remember that this was, to take Hebrew dates, as long a period nearly as since Christ, some 1656 years; but this is not all; from thence to the giving of the law there were some 800 years. That is, during some 2500 years the race did not get any education at all; and if that history is to be believed which Dr. Temple uses as his proof of the value of the education, the whole race, save eight persons, had been destroyed because of the result of the education they had given themselves. But this is not only a discrepancy in the analogy, but it upsets the whole system. There was no such education going on. The world went on, on another principle; leaving man, not without witness indeed from God, but otherwise to himself and with no education. And if Scripture is to be believed as to one of the most solemnly attested facts in it, the whole world was judged once, before its alleged education began. But here we stumble on another strange instance of the falseness of all this. I quote still Dr. Temple. "The world was once a child under tutors and governors, until the time appointed by the Father. . . . The education of the world, like that of the child, begins with the law." Now note, not only was there 2500 years of the race without any education at all, if we pass over the flood, and the whole world judged if there was, and the theory an absurdity; but, even supposing this left aside, the facts are misstated. "The education," Dr. T. tells us, "of this early race, may strictly be said to begin when it was formed into the various masses out of which the nations of the earth have sprung." That was at Babel, or in Peleg's time; but there were some 700 years between Peleg and the law, so that the education of the human race began 700 years before it began. And I pray you to remark, that this is not a question of confounding chronology with a great principle. The theory of Dr. Temple is, that the dividing into nations strictly begins the education; it was the forming them into classes. But the very vital principle of his system of analogy with individual education is, that it began with law, but there were more than seven centuries between the two. I suppose the classes at Rugby are in before Dr. Temple. That we may admit. At least they used to be, as the rule, at Westminster, when I was there; but if Dr. Temple were to leave some period analogical to seven centuries before he came, I am afraid the sanction of the law, not the law, would be wanting. What riot in the schoolroom! It is true, the present generation may have profited by the cultivation of the last, but at any rate, in my time, we should have had notable confusion. But we will be serious. Dr. Temple will forgive my recollections of these early days; he tells us they are often vividly remembered. But I turn to our Scripture history, and you will see the whole principle of the theory proved false.

Scripture treats man as a sinner, to be restored to God or judged: rationalists as a race to be educated, and the previous parts sacrificed to the condition of a little fragment at the end. It is a base idea, but it is its justness we have now to think of. Now, in Scripture we are carefully told, that in the sense in which there was an education and progress in it, law was not the beginning. The promise came 430 years before it. Now, this is an all-important principle. It brings in God, whom Dr. Temple leaves out. Grace, only in germ it is true, precedes law, and law comes in by the bye, as a needed convincer of the conscience. That is the Divine, the blessed form of education revealed in the word, because it reveals God, and must reveal, therefore, love and grace. Law may be needed. It was needed. The question of righteousness must be raised. But God had to say to it, and grace, and goodness, and love, must be the point of departure with him, because He is it, and is it with man. Dr. Temple's is an education of man without God; and therefore, as he cannot deny "the prevailing plague of wickedness," he begins with man's only remedy, commandments, to an unintelligent nature. But think of such a scheme which lets the person to be educated get to a prevailing plague of wickedness before he begins to educate him. It is well Dr. T. leaves God out. But this confusion of Peleg's time and the law, this lapse of some seven centuries, omits facts which shew, in another respect, the falseness of the whole system. After Babel, or Peleg's time, when nationalities and races had been formed, a kind of departure from God came in of which we find no trace before. Not violence and evil; that is the recorded state of man before the flood. Now, man had been forced to recognize Divine judgments. But far from the true God, yea, not liking to retain the true God in his knowledge, he changed the truth of God into a lie, and worshipped and served the creature more than the Creator; changed the glory of the incorruptible God into an image made like to corruptible man, and to birds, and four-footed beasts, and creeping things. Your fathers, says Joshua, worshipped other gods beyond the flood; Terah, the father of Abraham, and the father of Nahor. Now the God of glory appears to Abraham, and calls him to leave entirely the system into which, as Dr. Temple justly remarks, God had formed the world—countries, and kindreds, and father's house. The world was broken up into classes, but when God began to educate, He called out of all the classes one to be for himself; not indeed by law, but then He gave the promises. The principle of a called people, or saint, was brought out, and Abraham became, as an immense principle, the father of the faithful, who were known as called out of the world. That the world was educated by it is absolutely false. The world, or the nations, had rejected God altogether, and taken devils to be their gods; and God, patient in mercy, begins a race of his own, calls Abraham and his seed, be they in the flesh or in the Spirit. I have partially noticed some particular proofs of the progress of the world according to Dr. Temple and his companions; but, as they belong to this epoch, I will refer to one or two of their discoveries here. Lamech makes no comparison of himself with God whatever. It is all a dream. Unless taking vengeance is comparing oneself with God, because vengeance belongs to him.

If so, many are guilty of it still, I fear. At any rate, he compares himself with Cain, and he is not God, I suppose. As to the gross ignorance as to building a tower high enough to escape God's wrath; it is, without any contempt of Dr. Temple, his ignorance, not that of the sons of Noe. They acted very wisely according to man. They made, what Nebuchadnezzar tried afterwards, and a man who founds empires ever does, a great public centre which could be a name—which God alone ought to have or give—that they might not be scattered, but have united force. It was to be a Rome in the world. It was not ignorance, but profound political skill, met the power of one who had other purposes; and under his hand it brought on the very thing they wished to avoid. They built a city and a tower, a central capital to unite them all as one great company, and a tower which should distinguish itself, and to which all should be bound as belonging to it. Dr. Temple's notion is ignorance of the 19th century after, not of the 22nd before Christ.

But to return to our history. God separates a people carefully from the world, and gives them a law when He has separated them. The world was never under tutors and governors at all. When God dealt with the world, He returned, and returned necessarily, to the principle of grace, on which alone, even if law existed, He could really deal with a sinner. The education of the world never began with law. The world never had any law. God did give a law to a carefully isolated people, and carefully isolated them by it; made, as it is expressed, a middle wall of partition, so that if a Jew associated himself with the world, he was a defiled and guilty Jew. No doubt in this law great principles of moral government lay, I may almost say, concealed; but this only proves still more the great truth. God must separate a people out of the world to deposit, in a system carefully excluding others, the perfect rule of creature estate; and to preserve the knowledge of one true God in a world given to idols in their will, and given up by him to a reprobate mind to work all uncleanness with greediness, as every one who has studied the working of heathen idolatry knows they were, and indeed are; and the whole system to be a consecration of vice in its filthiest and most abhorrent shapes. Yet these efforts of God with Israel were fruitless, and the law given in vain. Israel first went after idols; and when that unclean spirit was gone out, their house was empty, swept, and garnished; they neglected the pearl which the blessed Lord drew out of the setting of the law, turned its outward ceremonies, which unregenerate flesh could perform, into their righteousness, and hardened themselves against grace and him that brought it. So true is it that the law was not given to the world to educate it, and the education of the world is not in God's thought, that Israel, in order to be taken as a people, is redeemed out of it. Till that redemption, there is no dwelling of God with man. Not in Paradise, not with Abraham. When redemption is even figuratively presented, it is said (Ex. xxix.), I have brought them out of the land of Egypt that I may dwell among them. Hence, as God's dwelling with man is never seen, so holiness is never spoken of till then. Because redemption is necessary to man's being near God, and that is (morally understood) holiness. The moment (Ex. xv.) Israel is out of Egypt, holiness is spoken of. No doubt, all this was in an outward, carnal way then; but the principle taught is all-important. Doubtless there were holy persons before; but here great principles are revealed.

W. Well, I must say, that this effect is produced on my mind, by the facts you have gone through. If we are to take the Scripture account of facts (and what you have remarked is true, that save ignoring the flood, Dr. Temple's statements are based on Scripture statements), but if we are to take them, not only is he mistaken as to the alleged facts, but what is far more important, if the Scripture view be true, his is totally false. It is not a question of details of ancient history which a rationalist might contest, but the whole principle on which God has dealt with man is the opposite of that on which Dr. Temple estimates what has taken place. It seems to me very shallow indeed. It shelters itself under references to Scripture, which might seem to give credit to the statements with those who have not yet thrown off all respect for those wonderful records; but when examined, it has not a shadow of foundation. The Bible is false in its whole teaching, or Dr. Temple's views are as unfounded as they are trifling and superficial. I am glad of this conversation; for, though I reject the principles of the book as really infidel, and morally unsatisfactory, I had not an idea of the hollowness of its views, at least thus far. The utter want of honesty of the part which speaks of consenting and allowing had offended me, as contrary to all uprightness. I confess that turned me at once away from all confidence. I cannot conceive how a man could openly avow such principles. But I had not examined the reasonings.

H. Mark another thing, dear W. It is a point to me most striking in the character of this system. You may have the law for a schoolmaster; Christ and the primitive church for an example; the Spirit to set you free, and leave you to yourself to be guided by the Spirit within; you may have Greece to teach you taste, cultivation and logic; Rome self-restraint, obedience, and patriotism; mediæval popery, to keep Clovis in order; but God revealing himself, revealing himself in love so as to draw out the heart, to teach it goodness by its enjoying it, so as to link the heart with himself, and raise it above the carnal and worldly and selfish interest of this low and sin-ridden world; God producing the reflection of his own nature in the thankful and enlightened heart; God revealing himself to man, so that he should taste and enjoy what He is,—no, that must not be ; the thought of being thus imitators of God as dear children—you must not seek it here. Everything but God, everything for man to think well of himself by, to be what Paul calls gain to him, that is, the nurture of self ; but God, no : no revelation of Him must enter into the education of man.

W. It's true. This is immensely important. How often one reads books without seeing what is underneath the surface. But this is indeed grave ; the whole moral education of man, without his being brought into heart-association with God by the elevating revelation of Him. I see it is anti-Christian in principle, anti-Divine. It lowers the whole of what is carrying on in man to what he is in flesh, and thus separates from God, instead of bringing to Him in living capacity to enjoy Him, and making man morally like Him. I have difficulty, do you know, in expressing what the effect is on my mind : for leaving God out makes all so false, that it is impossible to express anything then fully. A being who can exist truly only in relation to another, can have no truth of his existence without introducing the other.

H. To be sure ; and then if he be a sinner, introducing that other must be accompanied by that which reconciles the sinner to that nature according to its own holy and blessed qualities. This brings in redemption, and the education of the world is trifling, immoral nonsense. You must give up that which alone elevates man, his association with God, or associate him with Him according to what He is. The nature and character of God must be maintained, or it is not with Him I am associated. And I must have morally the qualities which judge of good and evil, as He does, to be really associated with Him. But I do judge the evil, and see the guilt. Now Christianity meets this, and gives me a full blessing, because it gives me life. He that hath the Son hath life. He is a life-giving Spirit. But then, besides that, it takes away all guilt from me. I can judge evil fully in my heart and conscience, because I know I shall never be judged for it; that Christ has by himself purged my sins, and sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on high. I affirm that, without these two principles, a new life and the perfect purging of sins according to God's nature by redemption, no real moral elevation of man can take place, because he cannot be spiritually associated with God according to the perfection of God's nature. The communication of the Divine nature, though absolutely necessary, does not suffice, because the communication of that nature makes one judge evil as God does, at any rate in principle. I see the selfishness and impurity that is in man's mind—that is, now, in mine. And for that very reason, I see guilt and wretchedness in myself. I have the conscience of evil or guilt (not necessarily by crimes or vices, but by comparing my whole inward life with the loveliness of the Divine nature,) on my soul; my conscience must be purged for God, as a consciously responsible creature before Him, that my heart may be free before Him, that His holy nature, which must repel evil, and which is the very source of my delight, may be maintained even for my soul to enjoy.

W. I see this very plainly, what God is, must be morally maintained for my soul, if I am to enjoy Him. If it is, I must judge sin as He does, that is, if I am honest myself. It is a gain, in a certain sense, to have a bad conscience in this way.

H. Yes; but a terrible burden, because sin separates from God, though we see He is love—but the purging the conscience by a work done without us, and which is perfect in glorifying God, gives me an unhindered delight in Him, and, I may add, in the love which has done it. God has put this in the simplest way, blessed be His name, for simple souls, but it is of the deepest moral necessary truth. You may have amiable men, but no God, if you have not this. When reading a work of Maurice's, a person of whom I know nothing, and speak, of course, only of his works,—

W. You mean him who wrote a work on sacrifice, and essays. I should like to know what you think of him.

H. I speak only of his books, I repeat, for I know nothing of him. I should say, he was an amiable man, with many elements of a fine nature, though with amazing confidence in himself—a trait which sometimes accompanies a fine benevolent nature, when it is not humbled in a Christian way by the knowledge of itself, and the supreme excellence of God and what we are,—our wretched, selfish, approbation-loving hearts. I should think, too, his books shew wants, perhaps divinely given wants, in the soul; but I should think the influences his soul had been under were half Socinian and half Quaker. But he has no knowledge at all of the effect of having a conscience before God. I said all along as I read, I forget which of his books, this man does not believe in guilt; and when I had got on a very considerable way in the book, 200 or 300 pages, I should think, I found “guilt, that is, guile.”* Now, there you can get the key to his whole story. He may have judged some evil, but he has never had his conscience before God at all. Hence, he can turn what that gives into a play on words, or a question of etymology; but what a tale that tells. Ah! what a difference it makes when a soul has to say to God.

W. I see plainly now, both what was attractive in his views, and the mischievous tendency they had, the mischievous influence they exercised on my soul. In fact, it strikes at the responsibility of man, our relationship to God.

H. To be sure it does. Holiness is the quality of a nature which repels evil in its nature, and delights in what is good. Righteousness is founded really on the same principle, but brings in the authority of God, which judges of this and the responsibility of the creature. Now, man will admit holiness, because that exalts man, makes him like God, excellent in himself; he has "no guile." Righteousness he does not, because this asserts God's authority, the creature's responsibility. It is making good God's authority against evil by judgment, our real relationship to God. This man will not submit to. He is willing to be free from guile; it exalts him in his own sight. But to be under guilt, no; that humbles him.

W. How subtle evil is.

H. Yes; but a personal conscience makes all simple. I do not discuss with a bad conscience; I can principles with my reason. With a bad conscience I want cleansing, and, because I have offended a loving Father and God, forgiveness too; and, thank God, I have it in Christ. There is no personal having to do with God without this. I may theorize and honestly enjoy my ideas; but theorizing is not the knowledge of God. A truly upright soul, a divinely taught soul has a moral need that the love of God, the favour which is its light and its joy, should be a righteous favour. As Scripture speaks, grace reigns through righteousness, hence, that God should righteously not see sin upon it; has need, therefore, that the conscience should be purged. And this it has through the truth, that the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanses from all sin. Without it, God's love would be an unholy love, would not be God, or love at all. We walk in the light, as God is in the light; and the blood of Jesus Christ, his Son, cleanses us from all sin. Hence, comes that bright and blessed testimony, though there in outward figures, He hath not seen iniquity in Jacob, nor beheld perverseness in Israel.

W. I confess I see no moral perfection maintainable without this, for sin there is in the world. No true assurance of heart with God, no true uprightness in man. And association with God, fellowship, is the one true and excellent blessing that belongs to us in this world, and the next.

H. Surely. But we will pursue our essay, though I have not, I believe, much more to say.

The principle of the essay is each successive age incorporating into itself the substance of the preceding. The analogy is: the law, Christ, and the Spirit. But this wholly contradicts the principle. These are no incorporations of past growth or acquirements, but specific revelations of a full and absolute character in themselves. Indeed, as to the two last, the actual coming of Divine persons. Not only so, but the law was given when men had plunged into every loathsome wickedness, and had learnt to worship devils instead of God; so that God had given them up to a reprobate mind, even as to what became them as men. And it was given, therefore, to a people carefully separated out from the rest of the world. It was no progress, it was a revelation to a peculiar people. When Christ came, it was after this had been broken, and the people become a whited sepulchre; and He likewise, though introducing universal principles, separates a people to himself, and is entirely rejected by men. When the Holy Ghost comes, we know on the Lord's own authority, that the world cannot receive Him, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him. In a word, it was no progressive incorporation by one age of the acquirements of the last; but revelations given to a people separated to receive them. The first, because men had departed utterly from God; the second, because the depositaries of the first had broken and falsified it, as they crucified Him who came. As to the third, it was manifested in power at the first; and instead of progress or development, there has been a corruption by the denial of the presence of the Spirit, and setting aside the word, which has made the annals of the church the most painful history the world can shew, as has been insultingly said, the annals of hell: and if the degradation of heathenism was more open, it was not so morally abominable, nor clothed with the forms of Christian grace. Sin among heathens was horrible to the last degree, and consecrated to deities who were only devils to help men's lusts; but there were no Christian indulgences to allow or forgive it, no tax for what it was to be compounded at; no selling of grace and license for what was condemned. This was reserved for what is called the church, and in the outward sense justly. And remark here another point of vast importance in the present day, when development is so much spoken of. What God reveals is revealed perfect in its place and for its purpose at first; and man declines from it. There is progress in the character of God's revelations, compared with one another; but in themselves, none. There cannot be progress in a revelation. It is itself. There may be in revelations. A revelation is given perfect. Man declines from it or corrupts it. That man should make progress in a revelation denies its nature. Now the things Dr. Temple speaks of were revelations; different in nature; but still revelations. And when I come to Christ, I find another immensely important truth—to talk of progress here is blasphemy. He is God manifest in flesh. He is perfection. Hence the apostle John tells us to abide in that which we have heard from the beginning. And I find here too a principle of Scripture, the ignorance and denial of which is the root of all these errors and modern reasonings. The Scripture (I am not now to enquire whether its whole system be false) presents Christ as a second man, a new starting-point of the human race, the last Adam. There is no progress of man in flesh spoken of. He is to put off the old man, or has done so, and put on the new, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness. He is to reckon himself dead, he is crucified with Christ—he speaks of when we were in the flesh. That is, the blessed and admirable doctrine of Scripture is the absolute moral judgment of man as man, a child of Adam in flesh, because sin is there; and, in the delight the new man has in God, he cannot bear this. He has crucified the flesh with the affections and lusts, and lives as alive to God in the last man. I am crucified with Christ; nevertheless, I live: yet not I, but Christ liveth in me. And the great ordinances of Christianity declare this as its nature. We are buried in baptism unto death, risen again, and we celebrate a Christ in the Lord's supper, not who has instructed us, (though blessedly He has done so those who are quickened, and warned the dead,) but died for us. Thus Christianity is founded on the total condemnation of the old man, (only that Christ has died for it in grace, and thus as a sacrifice for sin condemned sin in the flesh,) and the introduction of a new, but a new connected in the power of Christ's resurrection with that which is heavenly, where Christ now sits. The object of this new life is not here, though its display is. It is the true character of power in a creature to live in the circumstances it is in, from motives and a power which are not found in them, or else he is governed by them, that is, is weak. So with the Christian, with peace in his conscience through a dying Christ, he has a heavenly Christ before him, and his motives being wholly out of this world, he has, through grace, power to live in it according to the character of the motives which govern him.

This is not the place to unfold all the exquisite internal beauty of this principle, wrought out for its perfecting in dependance on grace, in the midst of the conflicts in which we are in a world of evil, with a lower nature in itself prone to it; and the continual association with Christ, our glorified head, the Man at God's right hand, in which it is made good, so as to grow up to Him who is the head in all things. This would be to unfold the contents of all the Epistles as the development of it in teaching, and the Gospels as the exhibition of the perfection of it in Christ: but I have said enough to show that the system of the New Testament is the setting aside of the old man, the flesh, the first Adam, because there is sin, (and sin is become unbearable when the true light, Christ, is in the heart as life,) and the possession, the substitution for that, of the new man, Christ our life, unfolded in a life which we live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved us, and gave himself for us. Was He a point of progress in the development of human nature, or Adam fallen life, or the perfect exhibition of a new thing, that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested to us, and became the source of it to others, while He has died for the guilt and sin which characterized the old?

W. I see this is indeed an immensely important principle. It strikes at the root of all this system. This builds up what Scripture calls the old man, and develops it. You say, its principle in fallen man is sin and self, and that God has in Christ introduced a new life in Christ, and to others through Him, and as He has cleansed from sin, so He has given a heavenly object out of this world. But then do you mean that no one had this life till Christ came down to earth?

H. No, of course not. Life and incorruptibility were brought to light by the Gospel: but this life did not begin to exist then. Christ, who is the Lord from heaven, is a life-giving Spirit; has not merely a living soul, though that He had of course; and He communicated this life to others from Abel, I may well say, and doubt it not, from Adam downwards. But then, for that very reason, though the great contrast, the enmity of man, of the carnal mind, against God was not brought out till the Cross, when the perfection of God revealed in flesh, was fully presented, those who partook of this life through grace were hated and rejected of the world, whose boasted progress is depicted to us by the new philosophy. He that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the spirit. They were moral contradictions,—one loved God, judged self, and owned God's authority; the other sought self, and would none of God for that reason. Conscience there was and is in all,—conscience judges good and evil: but a new life is good in a Divine way. Hence you will find, that with all this modern school of rationalism, even in its most infidel forms, Christ will be recognized, provided He be a restorer of what the Scripture denounces as flesh. They will use what appears Christian language to many a simple mind, but the just condemnation of a sinner, the absolute condemnation of flesh, and a new life in Christ, and atonement for the sin of the old; all this will not be heard of; and into this anti-Christian system even Christians fall. It exalts man; and all the blessed light of God, the heavenly place into which Christ is entered, is lost.

W. But what do you say to the other elements of human progress, Egypt, Greece, Rome, and the like?

H. If you mean civilization, arts, and mental development, and cultivation, and more particularly science, I do not, of course, deny it; though I think there is a good deal of mistake as to it. Discoveries by which the knowledge of nature or the power of man over it is advanced, are undoubtedly multiplied. We know more physical facts than our ancestors. Astronomy, Geology, on the one hand, and Railroads, Telegraphs, Chemistry, on the other hand, have enlarged, not the domain, but the appropriation of the domain allotted to man. And with every increase of knowledge there is a reaction. There is more reality and less hypothesis on all these subjects ; but I doubt the development of much more than materialism by this. That that is a progress I more than doubt. As regards taste and cultivation, or intellectual powers, I should think also progress more than doubtful. All now is at best imitation. Take Grecian architecture or Gothic styles, whose ideal conceptions are the opposite of one another ; or even Italian, all attempted is imitative. In intellectual power, I suppose Grecian and Roman was as developed in itself as any now. Plato, Aristotle, or what was more profound than either, the British triads or Bardic philosophy,* present the expression of as powerful thought. And as to language it is admitted, that as an instrument of thought, the Greek stands, of all commonly known languages, unrivalled. The powers of Sanscrit I am unacquainted with, and but little with the capacities of the daughter which most resembles it, they say, the Irish. In philosophy there is more truth in modern times, so far, not, as there has been progress, but as revelation has exercised an influence on it, and no further. So that I do not see great progress even in these earthly things. As to philosophy, all is necessarily false at all times, because it reasons upon the present state of man as a normal one, or else it becomes theology, and, thereupon as its necessary point of departure, upon his relationship to God, and what God is. Hence it is all necessarily false, both as to God and as to man. It is in vain to say that you must not bring religion into philosophy, because unless religion be fable it is the truth, so that it is only saying that you must not bring in truth. There, I believe, they have told the truth. That man is not fallen is a calumny against God. A God who made this world directly as it is would be a weak or a cruel God. But if man be fallen and in rebellion, and have to say to God in that state ; if his whole moral condition be the acquired knowledge of good and evil, far from the source of good, then reasoning upon his relationships to God to prove what they are normally, is to reason always against the truth. And that goes far deeper into the whole system than men are generally aware of. It affects every possible relationship of life. It is the reason there are magistrates, the origin of property, of labour, death, inheritances. I take the commonest, everyday, outward things on purpose. Philosophy, since it ceased to be cosmogony, is reasoning on morality, ignorant of the groundwork of the highest obligations, and of the whole state of things on which moral relationships are founded. Nothing can be right, or set right, if the world has departed from God,—because all its state is wrong; the central obligation is lost which was the groundwork of all others, though those others be true,—unless we bring in the restoring power of revealed goodness applied to that state, and that is Christianity. Hence it is a necessary consequence, that all philosophy is, and must be, false. There is evidence enough that evil exists, that sin exists; the man who will say that things are morally as they ought to be, is a devil, and not a man, take heathens or Christendom. If they are not, there is no sense in not beginning with the truth of this state and its remedy, if there be one. But that is religious truth.

W. But you have made a sweeping clearance of philosophy.

H. Truth always does. The mind may be interested in it as an exercise; my own has been, though I never pursued it far. Truth, as to its title at least, had too early possession of my mind. But you cannot deny that speculations, whose starting-point is false, can but plunge the mind farther in error the farther it goes. There is no πov σω. It is far worse than the play of Hamlet with the part of Hamlet left out. That to which all refers is wanting. If I leave out God, all is essentially false, and if I bring Him in and omit the groundwork of all present relationship with man as he really is, that is a state of sin, all must be equally false. Sin is the groundwork of all God's dealings now.

W. Dear! How do you mean that? That is a strange statement, is it not?

H. Is not judgment in respect of sin?

W. Well, of course it is.

H. So much so that there could be none without it; hence in itself can only be condemnation. If God judges his own workmanship as it came out of His hands, He is judging himself, not the work, or if you please, in the work. But if it has departed wilfully into rebellion, judgment as such must be condemnation.

W. But if man had never fallen, would there not have been a judgment?

H. A judgment of what?

W. Well, I do not know.

H. Nor can you know. There was nothing to judge, speaking of human nature; all was then as God made it. If man has abandoned God and gone into sin, I repeat, judgment must be condemnation; and that is the ground Christianity goes upon. Christ comes to seek and to save the lost. And so every divinely taught soul: "Enter not into judgment with thy servant, O Lord; for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." But I pursue my theme a little. Is not the exercise of mercy in respect of sin?

W. Of course.

H. And law?

W. Why yes, it forbids it.

W. Of course.

H. And salvation, and judgments, and patience, or vengeance—all is in respect of sin. Hence, the immensely deep moral development in the soul, in its relationship with God. No angel would know God, or be in the kind of relationship in which a sinner brought to God is. All the highest attributes and qualities in Godhead are brought out. Mercy, patience, goodness, condescension, love in its perfect exercise in the shape of grace, on one side, and restoring in righteousness on the other to perfect delight in itself, in a word, redemption. The intimacy which the working of grace, whether in the incarnation or in the soul of one in whom grace is, the estimate of good and evil, by the proximity of what is Divine to evil as it is in us ; yea, the communication of what is Divine to one who, on the other side, is weakness, and yet wilfulness and self, the dependance of a creature who has both on continual grace, and yet the capacity of the enjoyment of the highest good,—all this, which is not Christianity exactly, but its working in us, gives a display of Divine wisdom, and is itself a purifying and elevating process, leading to a knowledge of God in His highest nature, most intimate, and yet most adoring, which makes philosophy puny and dry beyond all belief ; empty, utterly empty. Christianity is light and love come into darkness and selfishness, and in the human heart reaching all its springs, and destroying self by shewing it and replacing it by God ; and this, not by the flimsy spinings of the human brain, but by a Divine person ; who, if Divine desires are wrought in me, takes me out of myself by Divine affections instead of exalting self, by producing in it qualities to be admired, which being by self makes them bad and false. The Christian, quâ Christian, has Divine qualities ; but sees, and because he sees only God.

W. Why you are growing quite eloquent ! but it is true.

H. There is nothing so eloquent as Christianity itself. Did you never remark, that Christianity makes the poorest mind eloquent. What is eloquence ? Is it not elevated thoughts clothed in what is perfectly adapted to the meanest capacity, and enjoyed because it lifts the poor heart, wearied with common-place life and toil, out of itself? Now, that is what Christianity does, because it reveals a Divine person, God himself, who has adapted himself to the lowest, yea, the vilest; who is holy enough, for He is perfect in it, to bring love into all the recesses of the human heart, because never defiled himself, and awake, even by its sorrows and its miseries, the want of, and to the enjoyment of, the love that has visited it. It has set too, by a glorious redemption and atonement, the poor soul, that by love has learnt to delight in light, at liberty to enjoy it, because it is spotless in it, and the adoring object of the love that has brought it there.

I look around. What can I see? Heathenism, men worshipping stocks and stones; Christendom, what would often disgrace a heathen; yet goodness and wisdom evidenced in the midst of it all. What can I think? All is confusion. The goodness and wisdom I see lead me in spite of me to God, and the thoughts of God confound me when I see all the evil; philosophy, poor philosophy, would justify the evil to justify God. But when I see Christ, the riddle is gone. I see perfect good in the midst of the evil, occupied with it and then suffering under it. My heart rests. I find one object that satisfies all its wants—rises above all its cravings. I have what is good in goodness itself. I see what is above evil which was pressing on me. My heart has got rest in good, and a good which is such in the midst of and above evil, and that is what I want; and I have got relief, because I have found in that one what is power over it. But I go a little further and I get a great deal more. I follow this blessed One from whom all have received good, and who has wrought it with unwearied patience, and I hear the shouts of a giddy multitude, and I trace the dark plans of jealous enemies, man who cannot bear good; I see high judges who cannot occupy themselves with what is despised in the world, and would quiet malice by letting it have its way, and goodness the victim of it. But a little thought leads me to see in a nearer view, what man is : hatred against God and good. Oh ! what a display ! The truest friend denies, the nearest betrays, the weaker ones who are honest flee. Priests, set to have compassion on ignorant failure, plead furiously against innocence. The judge washing his hands of condemned innocence. Goodness absolutely alone, and the world, all men, enmity, universal enmity, against it. Perfect light has brought out the darkness ; perfect love, jealous hatred. Self would have its way and not have God, and the cross closes the scene, as far as man is concerned. The carnal mind is enmity against God. But oh ! here is what I want. Oh ! where can I turn from myself ? Can I set up to be better than my neighbours ? No, it is myself. The sight of a rejected Christ has discovered myself to myself, the deepest recesses of my heart are laid bare, and self, horrible self, is there. But not on the cross. There is none. And the infinite love of God rises and shines in its own perfection above it all. I can adore God in love, if I abhor myself. Man is met, risen above, set aside in his evil, absolute as it is in itself when searched out. The revelation of God in Christ has proved it in all its extent on the cross. That was hatred against love in God ; but it was perfect love to those that were hating it, and love when and where they were such. It was the perfect hatred of man, and the perfect love of God doing for him that hated him, what put away the hatred and blotted out the sin that expressed it. There is nothing like the cross. It is the meeting of the perfect sin of man with the perfect love of God. Sin risen up to its highest point of evil and gone, put away, and lost in its own worst act. God is above man even in the height of his sin ; not in allowing it, but in putting it away by Christ dying for it in love. The soldier's insulting spear, the witness, if not the instrument of death, was answered by the blood and water which expiated and purified from the blow which brought it out. Sin was known, and to have a true heart it must be known, and God was known, known in light, and the upright heart wants that, but known in perfect love, before which we had no need to hide or screen the sin. No sin allowed, but no sin left on the conscience. All our intercourse with God founded on this—grace reigning through righteousness. Shall we turn to learn of Greeks and Romans after this ?

W. God forbid. It is a wonderful scene. There is, in truth, nothing like it.

H. Nothing in heaven or earth, save He who was there for us. The glory we shall share with Him ; but on the cross He was alone. He remains alone in its glory. Associated with Him there, nothing can be, save as it is the expression of the nature which was revealed and glorified in it. That we find ever in God who is thus known. Eternal life is become thus association with God. But, though reluctantly, I must turn again to our essay, to the effort to supplant the cross, for such it is, by the progress of corrupt human nature,—the cross, which writes death on corrupt man, and brings in a new and Divine man risen up out of that death, and a walk in newness of life. The system, however, we have discussed, as far as a brief conversation will allow ; but there are two or three passages which it may be useful to notice, some of them shewing the animus of this and of all these Essays, and of the whole school, and the miserable ground on which they stand.

As to mere intellectual progress in the sphere of knowledge, no one, of course, questions it. I may pass over Egypt, though boasted Greece was, as the Egyptian priests told Herodotus, a shallow copy turned into poetry of far deeper moral intuitions found in Egyptian mythology, deeper because nearer the source of ancient truths. But as to Greece and Rome, no one denies that, as regards the upper orders, they exercise an influence over the minds of the present age in virtue of their education. Whether it be in all respects an advantage may be doubted. They are not what is highest in motive or thought, I judge, but so it is. That there is progress, I cannot exactly see in it, because we go back for models and influence. If Rome had been forgotten, and we were a fuller and riper development of what was gone by, I should understand progress. But this is not so. We try and get back to what they displayed. How that is progress, I do not understand. In progress, I leave behind what preceded me. Copying Raphael, if I can, is not progress in painting beyond Raphael, though that copying exercise an influence over me. Then as to patriotism. It is human nature.

εις αιωνος αριστος αμνησθαι περι πατρης: was before Rome was heard of. If we desire to learn how consummate selfishness, which broke through every honourable and generous feeling, and trampled on all the world, disguised itself under the name of patriotism, we may surely learn it in Rome; or how democracy or human will closed in servility, and tried to hide its pain when oppressed in letting loose the same will in vice, we may go to Rome. If Greece have given reason and taste, I can only repeat, this is not progress in us. If heartlessness and poetry for conscience, if vanity and talent are a model, Greece may shine pre-eminent. Cultivation, I admit, as far as it can go on without morality. But immoral beauty, and such was the mind of Greece, which excludes the truly divine, (for even Plato declared the impossibility of any direct connection between the supreme God and a creature, whence probably Justin Martyr did too,) which has the creatures of imagination not of spiritual need for gods, which does not look at another world,—such beauty as this, admitting in the fullest way its very high development there, is a very doubtful subject of admiration, however it may call out certain faculties, which no one denies. A lively imagination connected with excessive vanity, and identified with immorality, is not a picture which attracts me. "What sort of morality the Gentiles would have handed down to us," . . . Dr. Temple tells us, "is clear." I do not know (though the destruction of mental purity is a great evil,) whether, with the present attempt to exalt human nature, it might not be well that maturer minds, at any rate, should know the excessive, atrocious, disgusting, immorality of all classical, and indeed all heathen antiquity, the universal depravity, besides what is discovered by mythological and historical research. It might be painful to such minds, and they abhorrent from it; but it would act as a warning and preventive against such views as those of the Essays and Reviews. It has been said, and said truly, that no decent person would allow on their tables in English, what is learnt by all classically educated youths at school. I may be told, they do not rest on it—be it so; but they become familiar with it in what they are taught to admire. Any one may see the picture of vaunted antiquity in the first chapter of the epistle to the Romans. That Dr. Temple tells us, is what is to teach the world; aye, the Christian world too. There is beauty, there is patriotism. What do I learn from this? That these passions of human nature and elements of his being, are perfectly compatible with the most degraded possible state in which human nature can be found. Nothing could possibly exceed the degradation, by vices which eat out everything naturally noble even in nature, in which these Greeks and Romans lived. The beauty and the patriotism amused or absorbed them so that they should not find it out. Stifled conscience needed folly or pride.

W. But it is difficult to know what to do. Are we to leave young men uncultivated?

H. Difficulties there must be in a world in which sin has made deadly confusion. But there comes in the noble active principle of Christianity: "To him that overcometh:" "Be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." Christianity gives motives, objects, energies which deliver man, when under their influence, from slavery to the scene through which he is passing. He has a right to be a stranger and a pilgrim in it. His ear has heard the solemn warning which elevates, yet sinks, with a sanctifying sorrow as to all around, in the depths of the heart: "Arise and depart; this is not your rest; it is polluted." And he takes up his cross, and sets out solemnized, broken in spirit perhaps, it is good in such a world, but cheerfully, because he sees that Christ has gone before, and that the victory that overcomes the world is his faith. For "who is he that overcomes the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God?" He can be himself, Christ being his life, in a world of evil and confusion, not conformed or belonging to it. Not formed by it in motive or principle of life, (though naturally as to mere outward circumstances not uninfluenced by it,) but acting in it according to his own. Happy to have companions in the excellent of the earth, but a leader and a Lord in Christ. By this he judges of everything. He has seen perfection in Christ, and he is led by it. Greece and Rome were all judged by that. The assimilating power is one only—Christ—God manifested in flesh; folly to the world, of course, but he knows whom he has believed: he has no doubt as to the excellency of the object and model, nor of its absoluteness and completeness. The Christian believes that Christ gave himself for our sins to redeem from this present world. Let not man tell me that meant the heathen world. What world was Greece and Rome?

But I must lead you to notice some particulars which shew further the shallowness and superficiality of this school. "The conviction of the unity and spirituality of God, was peculiar," we are told, "to the Jews among the pioneers of civilization." You see how they never get beyond this point: man, not the God-man, improving, exalting self: it is deplorable. But it is another point I must refer to now. "To every Jew, without exception, Monotheism was equally natural." This with purity "are the cardinal points of education. The idea of Monotheism out-tops all other ideas in dignity and worth. The spirituality of God involves in it the supremacy of conscience, the immortality of the soul, the final judgment of the human race."

W. You surely do not object to that.

H. Patience, good friend. In the main, though Monotheism be a poor word, I do not. But you know these good people have other elements of instruction. You know, too, that Babylon was a cup of prostitution, as idolatry is justly called in Scripture, for all nations; that Babylon and Jerusalem stand as the two seats of the two systems of idolatry and Monotheism. No doubt, however faithless the Jews were, it was faithlessness to a known truth, which truth was Monotheism, involving, as Dr. Temple assumes, the immortality of the soul.

W. Well, that is quite just; but what conclusions do you draw from that?

H. How was I surprised—No, I was not; from some acquaintance with these rationalist doctors, particularly superficial borrowers, as English rationalists are: I correct myself, I was not surprised to find: "She (Asia) had been the instrument selected (!) to teach the Hebrews the immortality of the soul; for whatever may be said of the early nations on this subject, it is unquestionable" (what rationalists say is always, you must understand, unquestionable), "that in Babylon the Jews first attained the clearness and certainty in regard to it, which we find in the teaching of the Pharisees." It is clear, therefore, that Monotheism involves the knowledge of the immortality of the soul; for it was taught to those who held Monotheism by the most idolatrous Polytheists in the world. Is this philosophical or historical? It is unquestionable, of course.

W. Now, do not be bitter.

H. Contempt is not bitterness ; yet, I admit, no human being should be despised. It is the glory of Christianity to make it impossible ; but reasonings and pretensions to light and superiority of mind of this kind I may despise, and do.

See again the superficiality of such a statement as this : "The New Testament is almost entirely occupied with histories—the life of our Lord, and the life of the early Church ;" and he refers to the Epistles. Now, that the New Testament does give us truth in living evidence of it, and works truth out in the actual living relationships of the soul with God, and is not dry systematic theology, I admit with all my heart ; but it is exactly the use of this blessed character of Scripture to deny the truth on which these relationships are founded, which shows the excessive superficialness of this remark. That all the Epistles were "the fruit of the current history" I admit fully. Very often mistakes and faults were their occasion ; but what then ? The doctrine is grace meeting need, not treatises for the competency of the human mind. But does that say that the revelation of grace to this need was not doctrine, and doctrine of the deepest and most wonderful character ? Nothing but the incapacity of apprehension which cold-hearted rationalism produces, could ever have such an idea for a moment. "That early church," we are told, "does not give us precepts, but an example." Fine words ; but as stupid as they are false. They will have only man. The Church gives. God must not be brought in—must not even give. What a heartless system it is ! Did God, by whatever instruments, give nothing to "that church ?" Were the Epistles not given to it—not by it ? Nothing, moreover, can be more false than the statement itself. There is not what Dr. Temple states, save in the smallest degree ; and there is almost exclusively what he states there is not. No doubt in St. Paul, from his very nature, his letters disclose the man ; but the Epistles are entirely composed of doctrines and precepts; whoever doubts about it has only to read them. All this is theory, perfectly regardless of facts. They are all "letters for the time," and all "treatises for the future." When Dr. Temple says, "To these pages, accordingly, the church of our day turns for renewal of inspiration," though somewhat acquainted with the pretensions of rationalism, I confess I can hardly understand it, unless it be a very commonplace fact put in a bombastic way, to exalt men now to a level with apostles, make the Epistles a mere aroused energy of man, reference to which may arouse energy in us. They turn for a renewal of inspiration. I ask you, what does that mean?

W. Well, I really do not know. I remember Balaam went to seek enchantments; perhaps it is that in a good sense.

H. I know of no such going to God for inspiration in Scripture. There is enquiring of the Lord. That, in the modesty of Scripture,—and how lovely it is in everything,—I can understand; and that a man taught of God, reading Scripture, may be animated, his soul refreshed, and filled with the truth and Spirit of God; but "turning for a renewal of inspiration," I must leave to the high-flown pretensions of modern despisers of revelation. I remember once speaking to the very chief of this system in a foreign country, one who has largely spread it among evangelical men. He denied inspiration as held in the common belief of the church of God. I said to him, "You speak of avoiding the question of the inspiration of the Old Testament. That is a very easy way of avoiding the difficulties of your subject, you who deny inspiration in the vulgar use of the word; because the Lord and the Apostles plainly declare the Old Testament to be inspired." "O yes," he said, declining to answer as to the Lord, as he had already given too much scandal by it. "No upright honest man can deny that the Apostles treat the Old Testament as inspired, and quote it as such, but they deceived themselves." He said this with an aplomb that was inconceivable. I only said, "Then it is a question as to your or the Apostles' competency and authority as to Christianity. That is soon settled." And so I must say to Dr. Temple, if he turns to biographical Scripture for a renewal of inspiration in himself. He must forgive me, if I still trust somewhat more to the old inspiration than to the renewal of it; more to the divinely-given teaching of those who were sent by the Lord and by the Holy Ghost, and fitted for this work, and separated to it, and who could say, "He that is of God hears us;" "and if any man be spiritual let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord; and if any be ignorant, let him be ignorant." He who can go there for a renewal of inspiration, and find only two lives there, must have a singular process of blinding himself.

Remark too the assiduous confounding what is divine and human. "The age of reflection begins." . . . . "The spirit or conscience comes to full strength; and assumes the throne intended for it in the soul." Be it so, though the confusion of the spirit and the conscience is a mischievous one, as we may see. But mark what soon follows: "Now the education by no means ceases when the spirit thus begins to lead the soul." "The office of the spirit is, in fact, to guide us into truth, not to give truth." Note here the use of Scriptural terms, so as to humanize and destroy their force: the spirit is first conscience; it is grown up at the age of reflection, and takes its seat on the throne; then it guides into truth. That in the Scripture is said of the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, who was to be sent down from heaven, who was to shew them the things of Christ. Here the spirit, which was just now conscience, guides into truth, but gives no truth. That is, the Holy Ghost reveals nothing, shews nothing; the Comforter is only the conscience of man. Further note, there are no precepts to be found. The Holy Ghost is thus dropped into mere conscience, and no truth is given. But let us proceed in the description of this state of full age. "He is free, but freedom is not the opposite of obedience, but of restraint." "The law, in fact, which God makes the standard of our conduct, may have one of two forms. It may be an external law—a law which is in the hands of others, in the making, in the applying, in the enforcing of which we have no share; a law which governs from the outside, compelling our will to bow, even though our understanding be enlightened or not . . . Or, again, the law may be an internal law; a voice which speaks within the conscience, and carries the conscience along with it; a law which treats us not as slaves, but as friends, allowing us to know what our Lord doeth; a law which bids us yield not to blind fear or awe, but to the majesty of truth and justice; a law which is not imposed on us by another power, but by our own enlightened will." Remark here how all subjection to God, or authority of God, is wholly denied. But this all gets a distinct character, uniting the first and last quoted passages by words in a previous page describing this time of full age. "Thus the human race was left to itself, to be guided by the teaching of the spirit within." Now I hold, as you know, that a Christian is not under law at all; he is dead to the law by the body of Christ. But it is one of the characteristics of modern rationalism, to take certain advances in truth, which the Church at large does not see, and pervert them to evil. Here the conscience and spirit are identified; and the spirit gives no truth, but guides into it; that is, it is man's growing up into it; but there is no revealed truth. There is a life, an example, we are allowed to know what our Lord doeth. The human race is left to itself, to be guided by the teaching of the spirit within, which is only conscience. But it is left to itself; no truth given, no precepts ever found in the word, and in addition to all this the authority of God wholly set aside, the law we have is this conscience or spirit within, is not a law imposed on us by another power, but by our own enlightened will, we bow to the majesty of truth and justice, to God never. He may neither give truth nor impose a command. God's word, His precepts, the Spirit giving any truth, the authority of God, obedience—is wholly denied. Now the scheme of Christianity is the opposite of this. It teaches of a Comforter, the Holy Ghost, who is sent by Christ from the Father, whom the Father sends in Christ's name, who comes and convinces the world. He testifies of Christ, and the disciples also bear witness. He does not speak of Himself, but what He hears He speaks. He was to teach the disciples all things, to shew them things to come, to bring what Christ had said to their remembrance; and he who loved Him would keep His commandments. Now this Christianity of the Apostle John, these words of Christ, every honest man must see are contrary to and contradictory of Dr. Temple's statements. He may think that he knows Christianity and Christ's teaching better than John. His opinion of himself in that respect I cannot doubt; but that his is the opposite of apostolic teaching is most evident. I prefer apostolic accounts of Christianity. Dr. Temple may think his conscience, and his, of course, enlightened will, superior to the Holy Ghost which Christ promised. I confess I prefer Johannean Christianity, if we are so to call it, the commandment of Christ—the truth taught and given by the Holy Ghost, to the first essay which is to illustrate moral and religious truth. It may be prejudice—it may be stupidity; but the shining of these modern stars does not, to my spirit and conscience, eclipse the teaching, aye, the giving of truth of the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, for so the Word of God speaks. Hear the apostle, who most clearly teaches, we are not under law as risen with Christ : “ to them that are without law, as without law. Yet not without law to God, but rightly subject to Christ ” (εννομος). How carefully he shews that there is subjection to God. So John : “ This is love, that we keep his commandments.” So Christ Himself, I have kept my Father’s commandments, and abide in His love ; and in the highest of His free acts of grace, His offering Himself, He says : But that the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father has given me commandment, so I do. It is with us as it was with Christ, the law of liberty ; because the new man finds its delight both in what is commanded and in obedience itself, as Christ did : “ I delight to do it ; yea, thy law is within my heart.” But we are sanctified unto obedience, the obedience of Jesus Christ. It is not a law stopping, or attempting, for it did not do it in fact, to stop an evil nature, but the will of God, the motive of the new man as of Christ. It is not yielding to the majesty of truth and justice, but to God. The doctrine of the essay is the casting off wholly God’s authority, the principle of revolt and apostacy ; denying the Master (δεσποτα, not κυριος) that bought us, the only Lord (δεσποτα) God. The heathen were partially a law to themselves when they were (αθεις) atheists in the world. This, with increased light, is what is recommended. It is a denial of redemption, of obedience of God’s authority, a denial of the Holy Ghost as giving any truth, it is merged in an enlightened will, our spirit or conscience. “ That early church (i.e. the epistles) does not give us precepts ” even.

W. But he speaks of obedience.

H. He does, but it is “ obedience to the rules of his own mind,” not the child once obedient to a parent, now in direct subjection to God in love as Christ was, but the rules of his own mind, all he knows. Christ’s delight was to keep His Father’s commandments. The saint’s delight is the same. The rationalist’s to be left to himself, and have nothing to say to God. It is the dignified liberty of a grown man, competent to guide himself, instead of being a child.

“The church, in the fullest sense is left to herself, to work out, by her natural faculties, the principles of her own action.” Can anything more completely deny the presence of the Spirit, and the authority of the Word, that is, of God in every way. What makes her the church in this case, I am sure I do not know. It is an epoch when men have learned beauty from Greece, patriotism from Rome, the immortality of the soul from Babylon through the Jews when departed from God, seen an example in Christ and that early church, whatever it was, and then left to themselves to follow their own enlightened will; that is all the church means. How the apostles blundered about the whole matter, to think that they were sent by the Lord, and laid down their lives for—I am sure I do not know what: and were so bigoted, that they say: He that is of God heareth us, and he that is not of God heareth not us; hereby know we the Spirit of truth, and the Spirit of error. Why the Spirit does not give truth at all. What a pity Dr. Temple was not there to instruct them! I suppose men were not ripe for it in the apostles’ days. And they were obliged to be thus bigoted, or did not know any better, and that now in this advanced age we can profit by and appreciate the teaching of these men grown to full age. I wonder whether they think that they that are of God hear them. Though I do not know why they do not leave men to the rules within instead of writing essays.

W. I do not exactly see, to say the truth, how these men call themselves Christians, and clergymen, too.

H. Oh, you see they can consent to many things they think very inexpedient. And though they have said that the Articles are not superstitious or erroneous, yet some expressions may appear so. If they have acknowledged the same to be agreeable to the word of God, some distinctions may be founded on the word acknowledge. They have allowed them, but "we allow many things we do not think wise or useful." He does not maintain it or regard it as self-evident, nor originate it; many better and wiser men than himself have acknowledged the same thing; why should he be obstinate? Besides, he is young and has plenty of time to consider it," when he has signed it, of course, "or he is old, and continues to submit out of habit, and it would be too absurd, at his time of life, to be setting up as a church reformer."

W. But Dr. Temple does not say all this, it is not in his essay.

H. No; he only joins in publishing the volume, in the hope that it will be received as an attempt to illustrate the cause of religious and moral truth from a free handling, in a becoming spirit, of subjects peculiarly liable to suffer, &c.

But I have nothing to say to Dr. Temple. I know nothing of him but that he is Master of Rugby. I have a book before me with these principles in it.

But there is a short episode in the progress of the world's education, which is somewhat curious. The progress of the patriotic Roman empire was such, that its utter decay gave occasion for the well-known swarms from the officina gentium to break in upon it. Now as they had neither Grecian cultivation, nor Christian enlightened will, and their patriotism was rather rough-handed, what was to be done? Why the church instinctively, not intentionally, gave up—for herself of course, it was very gracious—gave up her full-age Christianity in which she had been fully left to herself and her own faculties, and took up law—the only means of taming these myriads that had escaped the general education of the race; gave up Christianity, and subjected herself, that is, the whole church under its name, to the old principle of childhood—the law, to tame these barbarians. It was more than apostolic. Paul kept his liberty, but condescended to the weak ; but the church, not "that early one," but the mediæval one gave up Christianity for herself, (of course, any duty to God or the truth was out of the question ; she followed her instinct, the rule of her own enlightened will,) and "had recourse to the only means that would suit the case—a revival of Judaism."* I admit the fact ; only that there was a deliberate mixture of heathenism with it. How it was a progress, kind and instinctive as it was, it would be hard to tell. Paul had struggled hard against this kind of progress ; he thought it a falling from grace. Christ became of no avail if people did it, he thought. However, there is nothing an enlightened will and the Spirit guiding into truth, without giving any, will not do. It was, in fact, neither more nor less than the old schoolmaster come back to bring some new scholars to Christ. "Of course, this was not the conscious intention of the then rulers of the church ; they believed in their own ceremonies as much as any of the people at large." But this is somewhat obscure. Did they believe the legal system before they imposed it ? if so, they had set up the schoolmaster before he was needed for Clovis and his Franks ; and it was no instinct at all, but they had sunk back by their own evil instinct to law. If they were in the full light of the age of reflection and enlightened will, they must have known what they were about. This does not quite hang together. Did they get into it themselves by their instinct, or knowing it was retrograding themselves, impose it on others as necessary, and themselves adopt the revival of Judaism ? Here I am at a loss. However, "nothing short of a real system of discipline, accepted as Divine by all alike, could have tamed the German and Celtic nature into the self-control needed for a truly spiritual religion." But then, if they accepted the schoolmaster, they were not under it before, and must have known the difference. How they accepted it as Divine, is very difficult to understand, since they had recourse to it as the only thing that would suit the case. It was a singular procedure. They believed it as much as the untamed Germans, accepted it as Divine, and yet had recourse to it, because it suited the case of the latter. Their believing it Divine, and giving up an enlightened will, was a self-sacrifice of an unexampled kind, rewarded with darkness that made them think it Divine. When are they thus to get the truly spiritual religion? I suppose that it is not modern Popery and the immaculate conception of the Virgin Mary. We have had some thousand years already to tame the German and Celtish nature into the self-control needed for a truly spiritual religion. The Celts are under it still, perhaps. Dr. Temple thinks the Germans have got the start of them. But then this instinctive act of the church assumes in the same page quite a new character. The question arises, why the less-disciplined race—Germans or Celts, (though these last had been a good while under Roman discipline—of full age too, for they were in the empire that was attacked); why, I say, they could not have learned spirituality from the more disciplined. You see they had the spirituality, and it was by this leap into the schoolmaster's hand out of instinct that they accepted the unspiritual, the Judaism, as Divine, as much as the Germans. But why was the reverse not the case? "This may happen when the more disciplined is much the more vigorous of the two, but the exhausted state of the Roman empire had not such strength of life left within it. There was no alternative, but that all alike should be put under the law to learn the lesson of obedience."

The more disciplined, the Church had then the spirituality to teach, but had recourse to a revival of Judaism as the only means which could suit the case. Still it was not the conscious intention of the church. They believed in the divine character of what they had recourse to, and do you see the reason of this astonishing mystification of having a recourse to a thing as the only means suited to this case, yet without any conscious intention, yet possessing the spirituality which would show what it was—it was the state of exhaustion of the Roman empire, and that is progress. How charming is divine philosophy! They retrograde out of spirituality to Judaism, reculent pour mieux sauter, I suppose, to begin the progress over again; but alas! there is no good in meddling with low principles. They believed they were divine; they who were of the full reflective age, had to be put themselves under the law to learn the lesson of obedience. Who put them, God knows; but why had they, the spiritual ones, to be put under law, when they had already learned obedience of a far higher kind, and were disciplined and had spirituality to teach, only that the others needed the law? Ah, the truth will leak out in spite of theories; the professing church, like man in all states, progresses backwards. What is perfect in its place is given of God first, and man corrupts it; so did Adam innocent, so did Noah, so did Israel under law, so did the priesthood, so did the royalty, so did the church under grace. The whole of this statement is a wilful perversion of history, the progress of darkness, and superstition, and the legal spirit, and of hierarchical and then monarchical power is as notorious and well known as possible. The inroad of barbarians gave politic Rome the means of reducing it into a governmental system, complete under Hildebrand. But the corruption itself had been growing from the time the mystery of iniquity began to work, and was ripened by degrees into the Papacy, which partially supplanted the empire by an influence of a new kind. But that the church had to be put under law to learn the lesson of obedience, though thus laboriously obscured by inconsistent statement, is the admission that it had utterly fallen from its first estate. That going back to law was an advance towards spirituality, no true Christian will think a moment, in presence of Paul's statements. The return to law was the corruption of Christianity, mingled, and avowedly mingled, with heathenism as it was. The rulers of the church used this with a perfectly conscious intention, as the mission of Augustine to England proves, to bring them under their own hierarchical power. History shews, too, that as to the first great inroad of barbarians, its whole history was different; the Goths were Arians, and the theory, confused as it is, has no historical ground at all.

W. Are you sure that you do not take a one-sided view as to a previous point? Is not Dr. Temple merely insisting upon the use of revelation as light rather than as a law, and while insisting on one point as that which he feels important, not denying the use of revelation; only urging the spirit in which it is to be used? A somewhat exclusive one-sided view is natural, when we are absorbed by one view of a subject important at the moment.

H. Your question is a very fair one. We all are liable to such excess in reasoning, if not very watchful. But my answer is very simple. And it shews that all this train of reasoning is a dead set at revelation; that is, an effort with unconscious intention, perhaps instinctive, as the only means which would suit the case. Dr. Temple says, "If they could appeal to a revelation from heaven, they would still be under law; for a revelation speaking from without, and not from within, is an external law and not a spirit." Is not this as plain as plain can be, that progress means emancipation from revelation. You see, too, what a spirit is. God, any expressed authority of God, or given truth, must be absolutely excluded; it is the childhood of law.

W. It is fatally plain. I had no idea it came to this. It is not even Deism.

H. It is remarkable, that a friend of mine once heard Mr. Powell, now no more, I believe, preach; and he said,—“It is in vain they seek to escape mysteries. They must become Atheists, for the greatest mystery is the existence of God.” What loss there is, I need not say. The Lord says, that the Holy Ghost, the Comforter, which should come, should take the things that were His, and shew them to them; and all that the Father has is His, all the infinitude of the unseen heavenly, and, I may say, divine world, was to be revealed, and that in the intimacy of the relationship of the Father and the Son, so that we should have fellowship with them. And no man had gone up there, but He who descended thence. He could speak what He knew, and testify what He had seen; declare the Father as in His bosom. He and He only had seen the Father—but this is truth given by the Spirit (all of it, even what Christ said). All is lost; instead, we are to have the spirit or conscience assume the throne intended for Him in the soul, and draw from the storehouse of youthful experience, and legislate upon the future without appeal, except to himself; a law which is not imposed upon us by another power, but our own enlightened will. All that God can give of the heavenly blessedness of the Son, now a glorified man, is lost, for ever lost; and man is only to seek the development of what is within man.

W. It is, indeed, a loss—a strange progress. It is inconceivable to me how any who respect Christianity, can put their sons under the influence of such principles.

H. Alas! my friend, the greater part of the world, and particularly the upper classes, go with the stream; and if God, in chastisement, sees fit to let loose Satan's influence, they float with circumstances. The air—I use it only metaphorically—is darkened with the smoke of the pit. And this rejection of objective religion is as unphilosophical as it is un-Christian; for all creatures must be formed by objects. God alone is self-sufficient. He can create objects in the display of His love; but He needs none outside himself, a creature does. Man has no intrinsic resources within himself; whether fallen or unfallen. Nor even angels. Take away God, what are they? nothing or devils.

So man; if money is his object, he is avaricious or covetous, at any rate; if power, ambitious; if pleasure, a man of pleasure; and all other objects are judged of by the ruling one. In every case of a creature, what is objective is the source of the subjective state. In Christianity this is connected with a new nature, because the old will not have the divine object which characterizes, and is the foundation of faith; but the principle remains unchanged. "We all, with open (unveiled) face, beholding the glory of the Lord, are changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord." See what a magnificent picture we have in Stephen of this. In a remarkable way, no doubt; but still exhibitory of it morally, as well as by a vision. The whole question between Christianity and Dr. Temple's system is brought to an issue. The progress of human nature, with the very elements he speaks of, and the contrasted result, is stated. "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost: as your fathers did, so do ye." There is the relationship between man and the Spirit. Next, "Which of the prophets have not your fathers persecuted? and they have slain them which have shewed before of the coming of the Just One, of whom ye have been now the betrayers and murderers." These were their ways with those who unfolded the law in a more spiritual manner, and with the great living witness of perfection himself. Such was man—flesh in contrast with the law. Such was his state: he always resisted the Holy Ghost. Now note the contrast of the objective spiritual man. "Stephen, full of the Holy Ghost, looked steadfastly up into heaven and saw the glory of God, and Jesus standing at the right hand of God, and said, I see the heaven opened, and the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God." And what was the effect, the subjective effect, in one full of the Holy Ghost, of his objective perception of heavenly objects? In the midst of rage and violence, and while being actually stoned, in all calmness* he not merely bears, but kneels down, and says, "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge." So Jesus: "Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do." Then he said, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit," as Jesus had said, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit." He beheld, with unveiled face, the glory of the Lord, and was changed into the same image from glory to glory, as by the Spirit of the Lord. But how full and complete a picture—man always a resister of the Holy Ghost, under law, not keeping it; with prophets, persecuting; with the Just One, a murderer; with the witness of the Holy Ghost, gnashing his teeth and slaying in rage. Christianity, in contrast, a man full of the Holy Ghost, seeing Jesus, the Son of Man, in heaven, changed into his image, and killed by man, falls asleep, Jesus receiving his spirit.

Dr. Temple goes over this ground; rejects Christianity as an external revelation, that must be a law; takes up exactly the same elements as Stephen, and declares that man is progressively educated by them to do without that which Stephen enjoyed. Which am I to believe? Yet I have but coldly sketched the elements of thought; I must leave you to meditate over it, and appreciate the beauty and spiritual im- portance of it. It is a most enchanting picture, and the deepest moral principles are contained in it; but Scripture is a wonderful book.

* The same calmness marks his whole discourse. He recites the Jews' history, their own boast, so that they could have no word to say; yet it said all.—They had rejected Moses the true deliverer, Joseph their sustainer and help, and the temple they had trusted in, God had rejected by the mouth of their prophets.

W. But, then, this was a vision.

H. No doubt; but what he saw is revealed, and written for my faith to act on.

W. True; I see plainly that Christianity judges wholly that nature which Dr. Temple educates for itself; I cannot say for God.

This rejection of Christ in the world made evidently a turning-point in the world's history, as to the proof of what it really was; and this history of Stephen shews man resisting the testimony to Christ's heavenly glory, as they had killed Him when He was the witness of perfection and of God on earth.

H. Just so. There is a silent witness to the divinity of Jesus, and while truly and really a man, a contrast between Him and all other men, which has profoundly interested me. When man is blessed, morally blessed, elevated, he must have an elevated, and, indeed, to be taken out of self, a divine object before him. Jesus was the object even of heaven, instead of having one. When Stephen is before us, heaven is opened to him as it was to Jesus; but he sees the Son of Man in the heaven, and that fixes his view, and lights up his regard with the glory he saw. Heaven is opened upon Jesus, and the angels are His servants; He sees it opened, and the Holy Ghost descends, witness that He is Son of God; but He is changed into no other image by it; he has no object to which to look up, but heaven looks down on Him, and the Father's voice declares, "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased."

W. That is deeply interesting, and supremely beautiful. What a word, indeed, Scripture is. I find often these traits, which, to the renewed soul, stamp the person of Jesus as divine, more powerful as witnessing who He was, than even positive texts.

H. They are; but that does not diminish the importance of the positive texts. We enjoy these revelations of His person, but the declaration that the Word was God, and many such like, is a declaration which has authority over my soul. I make God a liar, as John speaks, if I do not believe it, and so I can use it with others. God has declared it:—He that believes not has made God a liar, because he has not believed the record which God has given concerning His Son. He that believes has the witness in himself, and all these traits which clothe, or rather reveal the beloved person of Him who was humbled for us, are ineffably sweet, but the positive declaration is of all importance, too. Note in a passage I have alluded to, two other ways in which Jesus is presented, besides the actual declaration that He was God, and the Word made flesh. He gathers round Himself. If He were not God, this would be frightful, a subversion of all truth, a destructive impossibility. He would turn more away from God. He accepts this place. All that is attracted by what is good flows around Him, and finds there its perfect and all-satisfying centre. That is God. No one else could or ever did do this, except in sin or violence. The Church can say, Come and drink, I have the living water; so she has, but not, Come to me. That marks the spirit of apostacy. The stream, blessed be God, flows there, but she is no fountain to which to go. That must be divine, or it is false. But mark, this is a new gathering by a divine revealed centre, not the educational progress of the race. It is the opposite, though blessed instruction for the whole race. The other way Jesus is revealed, is in the words, "Follow me." The same perfection, but now as man, there is a path through this world of evil. It is one, only one, following Christ. There can be no way but a new divine one, yet necessarily a human one; there is no way for man, as man, in the world at all. When Adam was in paradise, he did not want a way, he had only in blessed and unfeigned thankfulness, ignorant of evil, to enjoy good and worship. When man has been cast out, and the world is grown up away from God, away in nature and will, there can be no way in a rebellious world, in a sinful corrupt system, how to walk aright, as in and of the world, when its whole state is wrong. But if what is divine comes into it as man, what has motives not of it, nor of human nature, though truly man; if it gives a path in which the divine nature is displayed in grace and holiness in these circumstances, yet always itself manifesting what it is in them, now, I have a way. I follow him; truly, in everything, a man, but a man displaying divine qualities in the ordinary circumstances of human life. He says, "Follow me," but when He has said, "Ye are not of the world, as I am not of the world," and goes into glory, sanctifies himself even externally, in His ascension, from the human race, that we may be sanctified by the truth. How thoroughly opposite, to be sure, Christ's system in every detail is, from Dr. Temple's.

W. It is. But what you refer to gives a scope to Christianity, and a character which elevates indeed, attracts to an object, a divine object; yea, we may be allowed to say, attaches to it—but it shows that our ordinary Christianity is poor work, indeed. I mean, poor in principle. I am not comparing persons. Take myself, the first.

H. It is. Yet there is more of it, practically, where it could not be unfolded in terms, among the poor of the flock than we may be aware of. Still, I am sure, alas! you are right. But it is the beauty of Christianity, that being objective, being truth, "the truth shall set you free"—and a person, "the Son shall set you free," it works effectually in those who receive Christ, and requires no intellectual development to receive its power. Christ is received into the heart, and dwelling there by faith, produces the effect in us. Yet it takes us out of ourselves, because it is objective, and we, filled with delight in an object, in what is perfect, are like Him, but so forget ourselves; and filled by doing so, as He did in grace.

W. How skilful God is.

H. Yes; it is divine wisdom. Man would produce virtue by the love of virtue in himself; but then he thinks of himself, and all his virtue is rottenness. God gives us a human but divine object, and our affections are divine, because we love what is so, and we are morally what we love; but we love it in another, and are delivered from self. I would just add, that I believe that this adaptation of the character of walk to our entirely new position in Christ, is what is meant by created again in Christ Jesus unto good works, which God has afore prepared that we should walk in them. Hence, we are the epistle of Christ, engraved in the fleshy tables of the heart by the Spirit of the living God.

W. This contrast with the Christianity of the Scriptures is, I think, what strikes one most, because we are occupied not merely with particular errors or difficulties, but evidently with the whole system of relationship with God, of moral influences, and the formation of the soul in God's image; and, I must add, though I do not see any reference to such a thing in Dr. T.'s system, for communion with God, the whole system is the opposite of the Christian one. I must reject one, if I receive the other. They are more than contrary—they are contradictory.

H. Undoubtedly they are. The very starting-point is opposite. Christianity treats man as a fallen being, not merely as imperfect, but as departed from God, and needing a new nature and redemption. Christ meets Nicodemus at once on this ground.

The rationalist or infidel system takes in Christianity, by the bye, as it does Greece and Rome; but man, as he is, is to be educated.

There are a few points it may yet be well to take notice of. Can anything prove more completely how moral intelligence is lost, or does not exist, in the minds of these teachers, than the following statement: "The Pharisees had succeeded in converting the Mosaic system into so mischievous an idolatry of forms, that St. Paul does not hesitate to call the law the strength of sin." Nothing could shew more ignorance of the human heart, or Paul's reasonings. His principle is that the carnal mind is enmity against God, and is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. When the commandment came, sin revived, and I died, and the commandment ordained to life became to me death. If a law had been given which could have given life, verily righteousness should have been by the law. He sees an external exigence of righteousness, which imputes sin and gives no life. He goes to the very depths of our moral being; shews the law to be spiritual, and our flesh carnal, and takes man out of the flesh, makes him dead to the law by the body of Christ, that he may live to God. All this which ploughs up the whole moral nature by its word, 'thou shalt not lust,' sinks in these eminently superficial men into the effect of a mere converting the Mosaic system into a mischievous idolatry of form. The Lord Jesus did judge the neglect of substance for form, but, once the flesh had fully proved itself by rejecting Him—for lawless sin and law-breaking were complete when He came, then its nature is judged, instead of the law educating it. It is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. And now even our hearts feel that Paul is truer, knew more about it, than the rationalists, if one morsel of spirituality be in us. But turn on whatever hand you will, you are met by the superficiality of these pretenders to progress. Do you think, my dear W., that grace overcomes the lusts of the flesh?

W. So we have learnt, through mercy.

H. Not at all; "the moral toughness of the Jewish nature which enabled them to outlive Egyptians, Romans, Mussulmans, was well matched against the baffling evil." And so it has been communicated, I suppose, to our natures, which are not tough at all. Is it not deplorable? There is only one more principle produced in this essay, but an important one of the rationalistic school, on which I would make a remark—their view of the Bible; for they boast of the Bible and of Christ in their own way. "The Bible, from its very form, is exactly adapted to our present want. It is a history; even the doctrinal parts of it are cast in an historical form, and are best studied by considering them as records of the time at which they were written, and as conveying to us the highest and greatest religious life at that time." It has its value "by virtue of the principle of private judgment, which puts conscience between us and the Bible, making conscience the supreme interpreter." Now that every man has a conscience is a truth of the last importance. God has taken care that man, falling into sin, should, in and with the sin, acquire the knowledge of good and evil—a profound and admirable ordering of divine wisdom, as it was impossible he could have that knowledge before. The knowledge of good and evil, in one necessarily above all evil in nature, is the sphere of, and inseparable from holiness. In man this is impossible. He is in innocence, or, with a conscience, in sin. But then if conscience come with sin, while in itself it is the knowledge of good and evil, i.e. of the difference of right and wrong, it may be deadened, perverted, gives no motives more than approval and disapproval, no power, no living object, save as fear of judgment may come in.

To man in this state, a revelation of God is made from the beginning, a promise of deliverance in another than himself; the all-important principle we have seen of the mind being taken out of self—affections, thankfulness, adoration of heart introduced in contrast with judgment, while the truth of judgment is owned, law confirmed, but deliverance given from it. But God gives a full revelation as to the whole of his relationships with man, in responsibility, and in grace. That is, He either puts Himself in relationship, or shews a relationship which exists, with the being who has the conscience. We must consider it in both these lights. The latter is law, the former grace. Both were already seen in Paradise. In and out of Christianity, men have sought to reconcile them. Out of Christ they never can. But there they were, responsibility and life—a command (not knowledge of right and wrong), but a command—and free communication of life; responsibility and giving of life. Man took of the first tree, and never ate of the second. He goes out a sinner, with death on him and judgment before him—the promise of a deliverer, but in another; no promise to him, for he was in sin, but for him; the seed of the woman, which Adam specifically was not. The first creature, man, flesh, was no longer in communion, or heir—he was lost. Then came God's witness to men, and temporal judgment of the world on that footing, i.e. the flood. Then promise unconditional, again confirmed to the seed, to that one only, as Paul says, and as is strictly and profoundly true. (Gen. xxii.) No question of responsibility raised; God would bless all nations in the promised seed. But could the question of righteousness be left as indifferent? Impossible. It is raised by law, obedience and blessing, disobedience and the curse. This is broken, before it is formally given, in its first and chiefest link—that which bound man immediately to God. They made other gods; turned their glory into the similitude of a calf eating hay. Then, after various dealings in mercy, the work of God comes, not dealing with the responsibility of men, but recognizing it, grace, which brings salvation, sealing the truth of all the previous responsibility, for otherwise salvation were not needed, but going on another ground and meeting the case. Christ takes the effect of the broken responsibility on himself, dies for sin, and is the source of life, and that according to righteousness. The whole question of the two trees of Paradise, life-giving and good and evil, and man's ruin in this, is settled for those who receive Christ for ever, with the largest, yea, a perfect revelation of God as Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, in all His riches and ways. Two points come before us here ; how we are to view the Bible, even the doctrinal parts of it ; and conscience being between us and the Bible as supreme interpreter.

The whole question is, Is there a revelation? Is anything heavenly to come within the scope of man's thoughts? Has God to be known—or merely right and wrong discerned? And if He has to be known, must He not reveal himself?

Now I say, if we are to be blessed, God must be known. If I am away from God in sin, and so the Scripture treats man, and conscience cannot deny it, doing right and wrong cannot be settled but by returning to God. If a child has wickedly abandoned his father's house, he may leave off particular faults, but he can never be right till he returns and submits to his father. But the true knowledge of God is lost, and the more man reasons in sin, the more it is lost. God must be good ; I can say that when once He has been revealed, for heathens did not know this as truth, though instinct looked for it—wants looked for it. They did not in their notion of God rise above the passions of men. When they did rise above them, they held that God could have nothing to say to men. But now God has been revealed. Even the poorest man knows God must be good. But if I begin to reason, what do I see? an innocent child perishing in agony, the mass of the world degraded to the lowest degree by heathenism—How is He then good? An infinitesimal part of the race, for centuries alone knowing the unity of the Godhead, and they almost worse than their neighbours, sin having power over myself, brutality in families, wars, tumults, and miseries—How is He good? If I say, Ah! but that is fallen man, departed from God. Then I ask, how then can he be received back again? I cannot with any sense deny that he is a sinner, and if God did not make him bad, he is fallen. The cravings of nature prove he is. How can he be back with God, whom I must then think to be holy and pure?

A revelation from God and of God, is the first necessity of my nature as a moral being. I get both in Christ. He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God. I set to my seal, on believing Him, that God is true; but then it is not only the word received from above; that a prophet, that John had, and spoke of earthly things, moved in the sphere in which God dealt with man as a creature on earth responsible to God; but He came Himself from above. God spoke in the Son; His words were in a personal and complete way, though a man, the words of God. They were spoken by the Lord. Now, he that receives his testimony, sets to his seal that God is true. And note how this is stated. No one is ascended into heaven, but He who is come down from heaven, even the Son of Man who is in heaven, and what He hath seen and heard that He testifieth. Oh! what a blessing is here, which none else can give, for none else has gone up to heaven to tell us what is there. In this poor distracted sin-beset world, I have the sweet and holy ways and divine objects of heaven brought down to my heart, by one who is the centre of its glory and delights, and come to bring them to me in love, yet without leaving it.

W. But is there not a conscience which must and does judge what is before it? For instance, if a God was revealed who was not good, or who was not holy, how could I possibly receive such a being as God?

H. How long has that been the case with man? Was there ever a case where conscience made a difficulty when a revelation had not been given? Was there ever such a thing as a holy God thought of, or the need of holiness in God dreamt of, in any religion but a revealed one? We may find partial traces of goodness as to human need and deliverance from tyranny in India, in the avatars of Vishnoo in that otherwise monstrous idolatry; but all idolatry everywhere proves that the notion that goodness and holiness were required in a divine being by the conscience of man, is utterly false. The gods were the reproduction of men's passions with a superior degree of power. When revelation was given, and redemption was made known by God, then holiness and goodness were made known and estimated, but nowhere else. That is, instead of the conscience being between us and the Bible, or a positive revelation, there must be a revelation between God and us, and our conscience, or if you please, between God and us, in order that the conscience may feel that God must be good and holy to be God at all. When the revelation has been given, the conscience recognises it, but never before. Now this is essential and conclusive on the question before us, and shows us that conscience within is wholly incapable of judging. But there is a conscience, and when a divine revelation or light comes to it from God, it is susceptible of impressions from it, so as to have a right judgment, but never without, as to what is divine. Modern infidels are reasoning from the effect of divine light, to deny its necessity. As when light comes in, the eye can see; with none it cannot, and would never know it could. Scripture is true; when men had the knowledge of God, they did not discern to retain God in their knowledge.

W. I had not weighed these facts, or rather, I had not thought of them, but they are true, and they certainly put the pretensions of infidelity and of man's mind in a very peculiar light. They are really vaunting themselves as competent to judge Christianity; whereas the only light they have to judge it by, they have got from it, or from Judaism. Without it man's mind sunk into the grossest idolatry and moral degradation. A revelation alone enabled them, by revealing what God really is, and so forming their understandings to judge of what He ought to be. There is another point strikes me in our conversation. How little their themes bear the test of history and facts. They make boast of philosophy, but it is well known that up to Socrates, it was little but Cosmogony, and Plato's morality was communism, and his theology dæmonism, perhaps metempsychosis. This argument from conscience was what I felt least able to meet, for I was conscious that an unholy God, or one that was not good, I could not have borne for a moment.

H. You could not, I am sure, because you have a revelation. It is their great theme abroad. But it is always useful to meet infidels on their own ground. I mean on its untenableness. I already referred to this. If God is simply good, and the fall and redemption are not God's truth, explain to me the state of this world, three-quarters heathen, and of the other, a great part Mussulman or Papist, and every kind of misery and degradation dominant, and selfishness the dominant spring of all its activities, where lusts and passions are not so. If man be not fallen, where is God's goodness? And if God be not good, what is? Christianity tells me man is fallen, and reveals to me God in goodness in the midst of the misery, and redemption has an issue out of it: and the history of man, not succeeding generations sacrificed to rationalists' theories of progress of the fifty-ninth century; but revelations of this goodness and deliverance for faith to lay hold of from the day of man's fall, though the time was not come to accomplish the thing promised. And allow me to ask you, if man be so competent, how comes it there is so much difficulty, and conflict, and uncertainty? Why is there so much difficulty in finding out God? Why any question of discovering Him, if men have not lost Him? Why men believe in Jupiter, or Siva, &c., or Odin King of men, or Ormuzd and Ahriman, or Khem, or a host of others, which it is useless for me to follow ?

Why have they such difficulty, when it is owned God must be good and holy, in coming to Him and walking with Him ? No ; it is evident man has got away from God, many horribly, degradingly ; and the fairest of Eve's daughters caring more for a pretty ribbon, and of her sons for gold or a title, than all which God presents to them, to win their hearts in the Son of God's sufferings, and offering up Himself in grace for them. No ; man is fallen, has lost the sense of what God is, and of His love—has not his heart's delight in that which God is, or what is supremely good. Nothing proves it more than his not finding it out. God has given a conscience, but it does not judge the Word ; the Word of God judges it. In one sense, every man must judge ; but his judgment reveals him in presence of the Word. A man's judgment of other things always reveals his own state. He is certainly lost, condemned, if he does not receive the Word. God speaks, and gives adequate witness of who He is. He that believeth not is condemned already. Light is come into the world. If men prefer darkness, it is not their conscience. Their will must be at work. Dr. Temple professes to believe, I suppose, that the Son of God is come. I ask, is man bound to receive Him or not ? There He is to test every man's soul by His reception, or the contrary. It does test the soul. He has a right to judge, you tell me. If he does not receive Him, he proves himself bad, bad in will. He has to judge ; but if he rejects what is perfect in goodness, his own state is shewn. He is judged by his approval or disapproval of what is there, because perfection, because God manifest in the flesh is there. Because God is speaking woe to him who does not hearken. Yes, he has to judge. It is not his right. He is a lost creature ; but he is tested by it—it is his responsibility. How he can meet it, I do not enquire here. I believe the grace of God is needed; but there is God speaking—speaking in grace. Is He received or not? The two things John speaks of here are the words of God, and one come from above who is above all. Am I not bound to listen? am I not bound to receive? You tell me, must I not judge whether they are His words, and whether He came from above? I answer, yes; but you are judged by the result you come to, because God knows He has given a perfectly-adapted and gracious witness; yea, that He is it. If you have rejected this, you have rejected Him, and remain in your sins and under wrath. To them that believe He is of price, as of God; to them that are disobedient, a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence. It is a savour of life to life, and a savour of death to death; and the presentation of the truth and words of God, and of the Son of God, must be so, because their present rejection is the rejection of himself.

Talking of conscience between us and the Bible is all foolishness, and nothing else. The Bible is God's word in direct contact with us, telling to our conscience all that ever we did; that God is holy, but, blessed be His name, that He is grace and a Saviour. What is conscience as distinct from us? It is that on which the Word of God acts. If light comes, and God is light, and Christ was the light of the world, it makes all manifest, and acts on the eye. If the eye is in an ill state, it avoids the light; it does not judge the light; its state is proved by it; it judges colours, forms, and so on, by the light. But a conscience that is not "us," or a conscience between us and God, is an utter delusion. Conscience is the knowledge of good and evil in us. That it is without any further revelation of God. It has the sense of responsibility, and, though obscurely, of judgment and the consequences of sin; at any rate, as far as vague fear goes. But if Christianity be true at all, the Son of God has come, and speaks God's words. The moment He is received, that is, that there is faith in him, the first judgment of conscience and heart is to bow to him; the first right thing, for right is the just maintenance of the duties of relationship, is to listen, and obey that word; the most essentially wrong thing, is not to bow and receive his word. To judge God, when I know it is him, is the height of sin. If Dr. Temple or these rationalists do not believe that He has come and spoken, I will seek to prove to their consciences that He has. There is God's way of doing it. They must judge whether He be. To be sure; but this I tell them with certainty, from his own lips, that He is come, and if they do not believe in Him, they are condemned; if they do, they have eternal life. But if He be there, if they do believe He has spoken, their part is to listen to, not to judge him. With the blinding of conscience by passions, ignorance, education, it is of the utmost importance to have a sure witness of God's mind, not dependent on the varying views of man. If I lose the Bible, I lose communications from God; I am infinitely irreparably sunk. Dr. Temple, it seems, does not like God's word; does not like He should reveal himself. If he has a professed revelation, he "likes to consider it as records of the time at which they were written, and as conveying to us the highest and greatest religious life at that time." That man should be developed, that may be allowed; religious life, that too; but communications from God—no. Now there have been such,—God's word spoken in this world, or Christianity is all a falsehood from beginning to end, a holy imposture, which there is nothing like in the world. But if there have been such, have we lost them for ever? Are we returned to darkness? for since the true light shone, shone in one speaking the words of God, am I to have them no more, no more this revelation from God, no more any communication from himself as such. I have lost all that was precious and elevating in the world. I have lost communication with God. I may speculate about him, may know something of right and wrong, but I have lost all communications from him—wretched man that I am. What was man when he had not it? What is man when he has not it? To reduce Divine communications to apostolic life is to shew a will not to hear God directly, not to have to say to him, a dislike to have to do with the words of his mouth. It is not, “Thy words were found, and I did eat them, and they were to me the joy and rejoicing of my heart.” If God have spoken, and if we deny it, we are infidels; to exalt the conscience of man above it, as a judge, is to set corrupt sinful man above the authority of God. I read that the word discerns the thoughts and intents of the heart, it makes its truth and the authority of God known by its action in the conscience, it tells a man all that ever he did, but it reveals a God of grace—not that the conscience judges the word. Christ did speak the words of God. Are they lost to us? If I have them, is my conscience to be between me and them? What profound nonsense such a sentence is. If you do not know them, I will not call you an infidel, but you are an unbeliever. You have not yet set to your seal that God is true. Do not, at any rate, pretend to teach others, when you admit that God has spoken, and you cannot yet tell what is his word, and what is not.

W. I am glad you spoke of this question, for it is one of the practical difficulties to my mind in their way of speaking; because I feel I have a conscience, and yet I recognize the supreme authority of the word.

H. But do you not see, my good friend, that the whole object is to get rid of revelation, and its authority over us? If God has spoken, if there be a revelation, would not the first act of conscience be to turn and bow to it—of the heart to delight in what God has revealed, for He has surely revealed himself?

W. Of course, it would be the proof that there was conscience in activity, and not will, a heart to taste the blessedness One alone can tell of.

H. That is the very point, at least a very principal one, and it is connected with the fall, which is always ignored in this system. There are two parts of conscience; one, the knowledge of right and wrong, the other, sense of responsibility, and that to God. The first, sin has practically greatly darkened, the last, will resists, though it cannot deny. The word of God comes in, gives perfect light to the conscience, and much more, and presents the authority of God to the will. Men plead conscience as a competency against God and His word, saying, they must have conscience supreme. God will settle that question, whether His light and word is perfect for conscience, His authority in it sufficient to claim obedience and submission. A child has departed wickedly from its father's house, and thrown off his authority. He professes to desire to go right, his father sends a message, yea, comes and speaks to him, communicating to him his mind, and will, and grace. He replies, "Oh! all that is a thing external to me; the real thing is the inward disposition in me." My answer to him is, "All very fair, my good lad; but the trial of, and test of your disposition, is your submitting to your father's word, and receiving and bowing with a thankful heart to his testified kindness."

W. But suppose he were to say,—But I must know if it be my father's word.

H. All quite right. But I reply, if your heart was right, you would be only too glad to know it is. And when you say that, even if it be, it is only an external thing, and my conscience after all must judge, I see you take your own judgment still, and do not want your father's word. I know your disposition, your will likes to be master yet. Besides, let me tell you, had you been staying in the house, you would be familiar enough with your father's voice and words to know them at once. You are proving your own incapacity and evil. If you do not receive and understand his words, you will remain without, and prove that incapacity,—that is all. If your disposition was right, rebel as you have been, a word from your father would be heaven to you, and the heart would delight in bowing to his authority; and this very readiness is the disposition which, directed towards his own words, is that which, morally speaking, gives capacity to receive them; for the heart is right, and the will broken. If any man will (desire, be willing) to do His will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself. If you talk of your conscience being supreme, when your father has spoken, it is quite clear that you wish to be independent of your father; the first proof of the true return of heart and conscience is the self-subjection to your father's declared mind and will. You are not returned to him yet. Your whole place is wrong, conscience and all.

There is the knowledge of right and wrong as a faculty without God; but where God speaks, conscience is proved by bowing to it. See Saul. I "thought I ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus of Nazareth, which thing also I did." There was conscience. Once he has to do with the Lord, that he is right; it is, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" "Speak, Lord, for thy servant heareth." All short of this is alienation from God. A conscience that wants to be away from God, to judge for itself, is not an upright conscience. It is will and sin. Conscience is not only judgment, it recognizes the authority of God, (we are sanctified to obedience) and loves it, because it is true conscience, and the will of independent self is given up, the soul restored to God. For the word has authority as well as light. It tests the truth of conscience by giving light, but it speaks with the authority of God. Hence the Lord says, "The word that I speak unto you, the same shall judge you in the last day." Judge it now, if you dare. I do not believe in the conscientiousness of a man who pleads his conscience against the word of God. See how the apostles speak : If we believe the witness of men, the witness of God is greater ; he that believes not hath made God a liar. He that heareth my word hath everlasting life, says Christ. Why do ye not understand my speech, because ye cannot hear my word ; because I tell you the truth, ye believe not. He that sent me is true, and I speak to the world these things I have heard of Him. As my Father hath taught me, I speak these things. Because man has abandoned God on his original created ground, God has sent the testimony of heavenly things, to bring him to a higher relationship with Himself. And he tells me, the wretched sinner, he must listen to conscience, because this revelation is an external thing. To be sure, heavenly things, and the record of them, are very external to him. He has told the truth. He is out of Paradise ; this world is the scene which has grown up in man's exclusion from God. He comes with the revelation of what is Divine and heavenly to bring him out of that, and into what is heavenly, and he puts it off, and says it is external to him. He is right. Only if he does not receive it, he will be external to it. He will have a conscience too ; he is all right in that, and it will tell him what he has done, when the time of gracious reception is past. His sheep hear his voice. But ye, says the Lord, believe not, because ye are not of my sheep. The word and confirming works are given, adequate testimony is given. Woe to him who does not receive it. He will die in his sins, and the same word will judge him in that day. If God has come and spoken, and revealed Himself from heaven, and we do not receive it, He and all that is heavenly is external to us, and there is nothing but self within. But even in this notion, they only shew their ignorance ; for he that believeth on the Son, hath the witness in himself. The measure of the conscience becomes Divine, which natural conscience never can be, even when it is right. It must and ought to be human; whereas, when born of God through the word, on receiving the word, I receive Christ, the revelation of God, and of what is heavenly. He is my life; He is within, and I am called on to be an imitator of God, as a dear child, and walk in love as Christ has loved us, so that I am, if needed, to lay down my life for the brethren; for Christ has thus proved His love to us. My measure of conscience is Divine, acting because I have both seen and received what is Divine, in receiving Christ by His word. So that, speaking of its fulness, the apostle is not afraid to say, filled with (up to) all the fulness of God. Hence, John says, "which thing is true in him and in you; because the darkness is passed, and the true light now shineth." And all this heavenly revelation of and by Him, who came down from heaven, I am to give up, to have patriotism from the selfish and treacherous Romans, whose patriotism was the deceitful oppression of the world; and to learn that courage, which I may find in a cock or a bull-dog, has been ignorantly forgotten by Paul. It is hard to have patience with such contemptible stuff.

W. But we ought. The master you speak of had.

H. You are right; He was perfect in everything, and fleshly and unchristian feeling is apt ever to mingle itself with our state in such cases. Still though we are imperfect in it, indignation in itself is not wrong in such cases.

W. But there is still a question which I should like to put to you here.

H. Well, do so.

W. I enter into your feelings as to Christ. He whom God hath sent spoke the words of God, and he who received his testimony set to his seal that God is true. An immense principle evidently every way. I see plainly, that in receiving the Word, the very name given to Christ in this respect, I receive truth, submit to divine authority, am restored to God, enter in a heavenly way into a new relationship with Him, according to that which is revealed, and know grace, and, indeed, glory. But then the apostle's words. How can I regard them? Because the personal speaker is, so to speak, lost.

H. As regards Christ himself, the ineffable loveliness of all He said and did, of course, necessarily bears the stamp of heaven, of one who came thence, and yet could say, who is in the bosom of the Father; who spoke what he knew, and testified what he had seen. This is necessarily wanting in the subsequent communications; but, on the other hand, there is gain. "It is expedient for you that I go away; for if I go not away, the Comforter will not come; but if I go, I will send him unto you." Besides the perfect expression of divine good in Christ on earth, the question of good and evil was settled for ever. Christ being made sin, and God perfectly glorified by His offering of Himself and His being the sin-bearer, the question of good and evil was morally settled, and thereupon man takes a place in heaven. This was a new thing. Thus you will find that characteristically, for, of course, the same truths are found in both, John gives us the divine thing, the heavenly thing—God Himself manifested upon earth, Paul on the ground of sovereign grace, man brought righteously into heaven. Now Christ must have suffered, risen from the dead, and gone to heaven, to have this before us, and the message or testimony of it given. Yet it must be divine testimony to have any value, and that I have through the Holy Ghost sent down.

W. You mean, that the New Testament gives us a witness and a record, with, of course, many accessory truths, of the divine,—of God himself θεοτης, as well as θειοτης, manifested in man; and man brought in a new and heavenly way completely to God.

H. I do. The former, as to its fruit in us, takes the character of life; the latter, of righteousness; but divine life, that eternal life which was with the Father, and was manifested to us, and by which, Christ being our life, we now live; and divine righteousness. It is thus wholly a new thing—a life that was with the Father before the world was, manifested in Jesus, communicated to us,—not in Adam innocent more than in Adam a sinner.

W. But, then, this becomes a kind of independent life—at any rate, once it is received.

H. In no way. The character of this life, even in Jesus as a man, was the perfection of the condition in which He was. It was obedience and dependence, and a constant heavenly regard. He was the αρχηγος and τελειοτης of faith, a man with his eye always out of himself on God. So with us. When I say, Christ lives in me, I must add always, the life which I live in the flesh, I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me. Divine life in a creature nature is always objective, that is, its essential excellence, as indeed we have already seen.

W. Let me ask you what place you give Peter, then?

H. What there is of connection in this life with the previous ways of God he pursues. It is government; and this in the strongest way confirms to me the authenticity of the second Epistle. The first, is government in favour of the just; the second, as regards the predominant and licentious wicked. Hence he goes to the consuming of all things in the stability of which they rest. The saint for him is a pilgrim. The great fact of redemption, of course, is fully stated for this. But we are not risen with Christ, but He is risen, and we have a living hope through His resurrection; meanwhile the government of God is displayed in favour of His people upon earth. This evidently connected it with the Old Testament, though on new ground. Hence the quotation of the thirty-fourth Psalm, "He that will love life," &c.

W. Have you ever thought of the likeness of Jude and 2nd Peter? There is something strange in it.

H. How it came about may be a difficulty—perhaps a difficulty never to be solved, as many such external questions, after 1800 years,—interesting in their place, but immaterial. But the difference as to divine teaching in them is clear and important. Peter speaks of wickedness, and God's dealings with it as such, God's government, as I said. Jude of apostacy, or leaving the first estate, going briefly through all the characters of this, angelic, the natural man, ecclesiastical, and final rebellion against Christ, on which actual judgment will come; especially, of course, tracing it as regards the church from false brethren first creeping in, till Christ comes to judge ungodly men. Thus Peter speaks of angels that sinned, Jude of angels that kept not their first estate, but left their own habitation. Thus Scripture fills all parts of moral truth up. Like a dissected map, it proves its own perfectness.

In the gospels which these ignorant wise men are talking about, as to be harmonized and compared, and synoptical and supplementary, we get in Matthew Christ presented to the Jews, Immanuel, Messiah,—and the result of His rejection, but still referring to the Jews, hence no ascension; in Mark, Christ the servant prophet; in Luke, Christ the Son of man in grace, leaving them, on going to heaven, under the blessing of His thence outstretched hand; that is, the various revelation of Christ on earth as man: and in John, out of all dispensational relationship, Christ, God manifest in flesh, the Word and Son, and divine life displayed, and the giver of the Comforter; but even here no ascension, because it is not man in heaven, but God on earth. Were we to enter into details, we should only find this admirably, and of course, perfectly brought out. I confess, when I read rationalistic views of the books (I do not mean, of course, criticism of the text, though even this be influenced by their state), I am astounded at their absolute moral incapacity. External it is to them, sure enough ; at least, all that is in it, all that is divine. They have hit here on the right word, condemned out of their own mouth.

W. But as we are speaking of this, what do you make of James ?

H. It is equally admirable in its place ; not a high revelation of what is divine, but the fruit of the patient and perfect grace of God towards us. When Paul had been in the third heaven, after all he was a poor mortal ; and as, speaking reverently, God had put him in the danger, though by blessing, he sent him a corrective. It was Paul's evil, no doubt, that needed it ; but it was God's own goodness, which thinks of all our evil in grace, that sent it. And Paul, as you may see, got profit and advantage through it ; that is, as an occasion. Now I do not say that James' epistle is a thorn in the flesh, but it is an excellent corrective of it ; it is a girdle about the loins. Our loins are girt about with truth by it ; the exceedingly high and heavenly truth into which we are brought ; the elevation to which faith brings us ; its being faith, that is, a principle which takes us out of ourselves to rest on what is in God and His revelation, might lead us, not by its own nature, but by our utter perverseness, like Paul, not to be out of the flesh as it ought, but to be puffed up in it ; to use liberty for a cloak of licentiousness. It is dreadful it should be so, but such we are, poor wretched creatures that we are. James, that is really God, comes in and meets us, and with an appropriate moral energy which is mighty in the conscience, shews that the real power of faith connects it with life. Its reality is shewn—that is the testing word—by its fruits. And no one speaks of this as more of sovereign grace than he, in all its Pauline excellency, so as to shew the connection. “Of His own will begat He us, that we might be a kind of firstfruits of His creatures.” He too connects it with the law of liberty—that is, when the nature, the new man, and the prescribed will, go together. If I command my child to go where he longs to go, and tell him the way, it is obedience ; but it is the law of liberty. He speaks of three laws, or law in three ways : 1st. The law as such—here, if guilty in one point, guilty of all. The authority of the law given has been despised in the point in which lust was active. We are wholly guilty. 2nd. The royal law of subjective perfection : “Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself.” That is doing well. 3rd. The perfect law of liberty into which I look ; that is, the revelation of the path of the divine nature, of which I am made partaker. Revelation shews me the perfection of it, the divine nature gives me the delight in it. I am as a present thing blessed in the doing it. That James speaks purely of fruits of faith in justifying by works, is evident from the fact, that the examples he takes were no examples of the fruit of natural conscience at all. One was a father slaying his son, the other a harlot betraying her country. I do not know what the Romans or Dr. Temple would have said to her. But one was giving up every thing, even the promises according to flesh, to God, in absolute obedience, counting on Him even to have Isaac again, according to His word ; the other identifying herself with the Lord’s people when they had not yet gained one victory in Canaan over their mighty enemies. No one pierces more deeply, by the word, into the principles and workings of the human heart, or takes grace and faith as all, than James ; but he will have it real and practical, not speculative knowledge. And we need this, and delight in it, if true of heart. Nothing shewed more the really weak side of Luther than his calling this an epistle of straw. And I have no doubt at all, that it greatly hindered his entering into the blessed excellencies of Paul himself. But you have led me away from our subject.

of our delights in divine things is itself a testimony, and a powerful one. Besides, I apprehend the positive production of what is good is an argument for it (it makes its very beauty), as well as, at least as strong as, mere reasonings against objections.

H. Well, I believe so; besides it keeps charity alive as regards those who do not taste them, which there is danger that reasonings which occupy themselves with evil may not do. You cannot be filled with the blessedness that is in Christ and the Word, without both loving the persons of those that are simply wrong, and desiring they might partake of them. There are adversaries. This is somewhat different. There is such a thing as righteousness as regards wilful evil, and it is charity; but we have to watch ourselves close as regards this. If you saw a deliberate sinner seeking to corrupt a young practically guileless mind, would you not be indignant, and charitably indignant?

W. I should.

H. It is not reflective, but it is right, and a high kind of right. It shews a soul living in what is right, and caring for it. Seeing the connection between souls and God, which the other is disturbing or hindering, a millstone about such a one's neck and casting into the sea, would be better for a man than his so doing; and that is felt. How far these rationalists are thus guilty, I leave to God. But to turn to our subject—the word of the apostles as compared with Christ. The fifth of second of Corinthians states the change from one to the other. God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself, not imputing their trespasses unto them. There was the direct witness of God Himself in the person of His Son in grace; and when asked who He was by the Jews, He refers to His words:  $\alpha\rho\chi\eta\nu$ , in principle utterly and entirely what I have said to you; or, as in the English, from the beginning. His words expressed himself. Then we have a third point, committing unto us the ministry of reconciliation. "Now then we are ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech by us, we beseech in Christ's stead—be reconciled to God; for He hath made Him to be sin for us who knew no sin, that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him." God had Himself, in Christ, testified perfect grace in His words and ways with man; revealed what was heavenly as one who had come down from heaven, and was the Son of Man who was in Heaven: It was the blessed, gracious revelation of what was heavenly to men, meeting all their wants and sorrows withal. But man would none of it. No man receiveth his testimony. He then accomplishes the work which was to bring His redeemed into heaven. "Father, I will, that they whom thou hast given me be with me where I am;" and He goes to prepare a place for them. But thus His ministry by the Word was closed, and He, having secured everlasting righteousness and the glory of God in their admission, sends down the Holy Ghost to be to earth a witness of it in chosen vessels, and, practically, in all who should receive their testimony. He tells them, that it should not be they that spake, but the Spirit of their Father who spoke in them; and so far from inferior was that testimony, that He encourages His disciples by saying, that a blasphemy against Him who spoke in it would be unpardonable, while a word against Himself as humbled might be forgiven. (Luke xii. 10-12.) Hence John says, "He that is of God heareth us; he that is not of God heareth not us; hereby know we the Spirit of truth and the spirit of error." And the apostle Paul: "If any one be spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord." Again: "Now we have received not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things which are freely given to us of God; which things, also, we speak, not in the words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, comparing, or, as I have no doubt, is the sense, using a spiritual medium for communicating spiritual things. That these things animated their life too is true; but where did they get them? The Holy Ghost was come down from heaven, as the Son had come down. He was to shew them the things of Christ; to guide them into all truth; shew them things to come. I suppose if they lived in the things, they must have learned them somehow. What wretched pleading it is to say, it is the expression of the highest and greatest religious life of the time. To be sure it was. But where did they get the things to communicate on which they lived? What was the power in which they communicated them? Can Dr. Temple, who fancies he sees this life clearer than his neighbours, can he tell us anything he has not got from their revelations? He, we may hope, is living on what they communicated; but who communicated them for him to live on? All this is shuffling about the matter to deny revelation. No one could testify of what was in heaven directly, but one who came thence. Christ did, and says so; the Holy Ghost did, and communicated, through suited vessels, the glory of Christ, and the Father's love in Him. Thus it was. After the law, the rule of God's government on earth, the prophets showed the coming Messiah, His sufferings and glories; but it was as seeing it afar off, and recalling to the law, not announcing the kingdom as then coming;—the law and the prophets were until John. By him the kingdom is preached. He goes before the face of Jehovah to prepare His way. He receives from above his testimony and place; but his testimony was of the earth, repentance, judgment, the kingdom—Messiah coming amongst them. Then Christ comes, but does not receive from heaven, but comes from heaven, and can tell directly what He has seen, and knows, and has heard. He is in the bosom of the Father, and can declare God; and He does so. No man receiveth

His testimony. Man wills not what is heavenly. But what an infinite blessing is this of which these rationalists would deprive us—the positive revelation of what is heavenly, the blessed communication of what is there above. To talk of life and religious life is all simple nonsense. Can religious life reveal what it has never seen, the blessedness in which it has never yet been? True religious Christian life is formed by this revelation; and think of reducing men to mere conscience and rejecting the revelation even of what is heavenly, to conscience. What a lowering thing it is. No; the Son speaks what He knows, and testifies what He has seen. It is the very essence of Christianity, and sole source of blessing. But man, being so evil as to reject it, God is not frustrated in His love; the need of it as above all is made manifest; redemption is accomplished, and thereon, man takes his seat on high on the Throne of God, and the Holy Ghost is sent down the witness and proof of it, and testifies of the glory he (man) is in, his relationship with God his Father, all the wisdom and glory of the counsels and work by which he is brought there; the church's place with Christ, founding a perfected and purged conscience on the work of Christ, so that holiness is righteously connected with the entrance of a sinner into the glory he had come utterly short of. This links the heart to what is heavenly; while the testimony of the Holy Ghost is the sure foundation on which the soul can rest, for the certainty of it as truthful, and thus a living enjoyment. God's will and counsel; Christ's accomplished work; the Holy Ghost's testimony (Heb. x.): that is what gives liberty and boldness to enter into the presence of God. The Scriptures are the recorded testimony for all times. Ministry does not cease, but revelation does, when all is revealed. The Word of God is completed.

W. I see the Divine system in what you say, and its wisdom and completeness while we have to live by faith. But there is a question I should like to ask you in connection with this—What place do you give to criticism in this?

H. I use it with all my heart. If my father had left a will of his, copied for the various members of the family, which, we felt, bound us all, in which all had an interest, and were all subject to, of course, in copying, some errors might have crept in. So in the Scriptures, the oracles of God were committed to men,—(mark the expressions—the oracles of God, it is formal; that is not mere life expressed,) while Providence watched over them. But there was as to this the responsibility of man; as in all God's ways with us, there is this connection of responsibility, and yet security by grace. Well, errors have crept in to this will; but we are all desirous of knowing accurately our Father's mind, assured that it is in the will. We compare copies, to have it as accurately given as possible. I do so, because it has authority, absolute authority, over me the child. Had it not, I should not do so. The multiplication of the copies which has so far multiplied occasional mistakes, quas aut incuria fudit aut humana parum cavit natura, has also multiplied the certainty, that the whole will is right, and has enabled me to correct isolated errors in each one copy by comparing it with the others. If a word or two remain illegible, or not to be ascertained, I must leave that word, lose its force, if the same disposition be not elsewhere. But it is evident I should, if I attached value to my Father's will as such, carefully compare all, to have it exact. This has been done by men skilled in it, proving how little was uncertain, and that little affecting doctrine nowhere.

W. This I see very distinctly. The proofs of the Divine record lie elsewhere. This is mere care for its correctness, because it is so estimated, in which providential care and Divine faithfulness is to be trusted, as in everything we are blessed in.

H. Just so. There is no Divine blessing but by faith, nor can be, when it passes beyond mere temporal enjoyments, and they are never divinely enjoyed but by faith. This is the necessary link between the soul of man and an unseen God. In truth, it was needed when He was manifested ; for no man can see God, morally speaking. Therefore it was said then, He that seeth the Son, and believeth on Him, hath everlasting life. Were it possible to see His glory and live, it would be no moral link of the soul with Him. If a man were even kept from sin by it, which outwardly he might, it would be no real enjoyment of Him, nor living spiritual fellowship.

I think we have pretty well exhausted the subject of this essay, and enjoyed some excursions by the way, to scenes it opened out to view as we passed. Many details might be taken up, but I do not know that we should gain any thing material by referring to them ; such as the habits of false moral estimation introduced by the heathen apprehension of things often current. His three witnesses quarrelled, but that proves nothing, if they had different partial elements of truth. It is seen every day in poor human nature, so that I do not insist on this ; but some I will refer to. Two of these witnesses—Rome and the early church, disliked each other. Yet that dislike, we are told, makes little impression on us now. What an advance through indifferentism to an Anti-Christian state. For so absolute is truth, is Christ's claim, that he that is not with me is against me. This dislike that Dr. Temple and his school remain unaffected by, is the deadly persecuting hatred of Christians, of the saints, (certainly, whatever faults there may have been, the excellent of the earth,) by the heathens. The hatred of Christ and His people by the worshippers of idols and devils. The enmity of man and Satan (for we are not going to give up our belief that Jesus was the Christ of God for these gentlemen) against the Son of God and all that owned Him.

This makes little impression on them, no doubt. In the fourth essay we read, "It was natural for a Christian in the earliest period, to look upon the heathen state in which he found himself, as if it belonged to the kingdom of Satan, and not to that of God; and consecrated as it was in all its offices to the heathen divinities, to consider it a society having its origin from the powers of darkness, not from the Lord of light and life." And what do these clergymen and professed teachers of Christianity believe? What were the heathen gods and goddesses? I read in the first essay, "The natural religious shadows projected by the spiritual light within, shining on the dark problems without, were all in reality systems of law given also by God, though not given by revelation." No doubt, they say, they distorted and corrupted, &c. But can you for a moment believe that the worship of Jupiter, and Venus, and Bacchus, and horrors which are simple facts, as they may be read in Romans i. (which after all, though in just language, passes over the surface of turpitude, not to defile itself, by sinking into details to which I cannot here refer either), were systems of law given by God. The worship of passions and devils, gloating in the unutterable degradation of God's most wonderful creature, a system of law given of God! And it is false as to its history. Heathenism was even in this aspect, the departure under devilish influence from the knowledge of God. Noah had this, and they did not like to retain God in their knowledge; and God gave them up to dishonour themselves. They degraded God to a brute, and themselves to worse after. It never was a training parallel to, and contemporaneous with that of the Hebrews—a system of law given of God, and then corrupted. There was the knowledge of the true God, and men gave it up. As far as the history of these dark ages can be traced, a system deliberately taken up in Babel, to leave God, and separated into two hostile branches. The Sabæans, who did not go further than taking fire as a representative of God, as the modern Parsees; and Ionism, a system of horrible wickedness and idolatry pervading India, Egypt, Phœnice, and thence Greece, which made, possibly, through Orpheus and the Cabiri, certainly in Hesiod and Homer, pretty poetry of it, and so passing on to Rome, and I have little doubt, far and wide, elsewhere, modified according to the spirit and character of nations, at any rate, in historically known nations, a common universal system. It is a perfect iniquity to say as to the principle of it, and false as to the history of it, that these were systems of law given of God, though not by revelation. There was a knowledge of God departed from. That was corrupted, and man with it. Devils and deified passions took the place of God in the heart. To say, "Ultimately the gospel was to have sway in doing more perfectly that which heathen religions were doing imperfectly," has only to be stated, to revolt every divinely taught mind. What did heathenism do? Hold the State together. Be it so; but they admit this only decorated the surface of it. But morally in relationship to God, what did it do? That these educators of the world do not, I suppose, care about. Christianity, they say, was not only to quicken the spirit of the individual, (What is that?) but to sanctify civil institutions—heathenism decorated the surface. But even as to the church,—Heathenism, they tell us, had its national churches.

This defence of heathenism seems to me, dear friend, as immoral in its character as it is false historically. In heathenism there was, as there must be in man, an instinct as to God, but laid hold of by Satan to pander to the passions of men. God, with some instinctive remains of a supreme God (testimonium animæ naturaliter christianæ) turned into calves, cats, and monkeys, and beasts. There were four principles as it seems to me at work in heathenism. The instinct of a supreme being, or a superior one, at any rate, above man, impossible to be got rid of; heroism or the deification of ancestors traceable everywhere, and connecting itself, in its earlier and oriental phases, with Noah and his family and the ark; the idea is carried to excess by Bryant, but it seems to me incontrovertible; thirdly, the stars, as something wonderful, instinct with movement, and acting on the earth; and, lastly, what led to such horrible corruption; the sense of a generative power of nature, partly abstract, partly running through every sphere of thought, and connected with the ruin of nature, and a certain resurrection in power, which linked it with day and night, and summer and winter. This, helped by various traditions, formed various systems; but all of man without God, to be found if at all, as the αγνώστου θεός: in India, in certain respects, the most elevated, but the most monstrous; more of God's interest in man and His coming down, though there was Apotheosis: in Egypt, one more wise and applied to human morality and organisation, yet the same system thoroughly, with more of the sentiment of a definite judgment of God, and conflict of good and evil in the history of Osiris, Amenti, and Typhon, dead men not execrated were called justified: in Greece, the lowest and poorest of all, which made man and poetry everything: gods became men, or swans, or bulls to indulge their passions. It was the deification of man, and morally more contemptible than all. No gods but gods of human passions, money, war, corrupt lusts—gods in which there was no single association with conscience, except a dreary Tartarus for those who might despise them, and an Elysium so poor that Achilles complained bitterly of being there. It is the system of deification of human passions, and another world only used to make gods of them, and these gods, that is devils, important, and this world the only excellent place. This was a system of law, we are told, given of God. I am silent. I fear I should be rebuked by you for something contemptuous and bitter, and say nothing of what I feel.

As to Rome there was nothing new, they were not poetical, but political; and their religion too. The god Terminus was immoveable. Can these clergymen shew me one single proof of any heathenism being a system of law given of God? The instinct that there is something above him is in man, cannot be eradicated, a conscience accompanies him, in spite of the devil. Is there anything to be found in heathenism besides this fact perverted to men's offering the things which they offered to devils, and not to God; and the consecrating the worst passions, and their most intolerable effects to these devils or dung-gods, as Scripture calls them, so as to destroy that conscience, if it had been possible? Do our Essayists think their judgment of heathenism, or that of Scripture in the Old and New Testament, the most correct? Their admirable Trajan they must view as a heathen to admire. They turn round the other side, and see that the subduer of Dacia, the mighty emperor, is with heartless indifference of character the cool persecutor of those who owned the Son of God, and the restorer of sacrifices to devils. "They are so eager for light, that they will rub their eyes in the dark, and take the resulting optical delusions for real flashes." Excuse me if I quote this not very elegant image of Dr. Temple's as a singular but not inapt description of a state of mind in which, of course, he has not described himself. In fine, the foundation of the whole system is false. There was progress in the revelation of God's mind, because of the alienation of man from God, and the ignorance that was in him, but it never was the education of the world at all. It began not by law, but, as became the God of all grace, by promise, but not by promise to the world, though in favour of it, and for all that should believe it at all times; then law, but not given to the world, but to a people separated out of it, because of the horrible state the world was in, and a careful separation made between them, to keep, at any rate, in one little corner the knowledge of the true God, that all might not be wholly debased. Then the Son of God coming into it, but the world knew Him not, His own received Him not; and they joined in crucifying Him. He was the Shepherd of a little flock. Then the Holy Ghost sent whom the world cannot receive, because it seeth Him not, neither knoweth Him; but given to those who believe; but with the fullest witness of grace to all who do believe the record God has given concerning His Son. Does Dr. Temple believe these facts, or deny them? Is he, that is, a Christian or an infidel?

Heathenism was not different contemporary systems of law given of God, but the giving up the knowledge of the true God, and plunging into devilish idolatry and bestial corruption, though God did not allow, let Satan do what he could, that they should destroy the instincts that there was a God, nor flee from the torment of a violated conscience. The whole system is historically and actually false. I believe, dear friend, in Christianity, not in the reveries of one who, to use their own somewhat vulgar simile already quoted, which I only do use as theirs, "are so eager for light (not having God's, and reflecting it, Christ come as light into the world in darkness,) that they will rub their eyes in the dark, and take the resulting optical delusions for real flashes." It suggests to me the word addressed to poor Israel on lower ground than ours, for the true light now shines: "Who is among you that feareth Jehovah, that obeyeth the voice of His servant, that walketh in darkness, and hath no light; let him trust in the name of Jehovah, and stay upon his God. Behold, all ye that kindle a fire, that compass yourselves about with sparks, walk in the light of your fire, and in the sparks that ye have kindled. This shall ye have at my hand. Ye shall lie down in sorrow."

You know well, your heart knows, dear friend, how utterly far my spirit is from an ungracious feeling towards the authors of these essays, of whom I have no knowledge whatever, and desire unfeignedly from the bottom of my heart, their good and blessing. But such is their path. I speak of the system, a system so hard and unfeeling, that it has no idea but of beginning with law, that even a mother's tender care of the fruit of the womb is known only as correcting wilfulness of temper, and germs of wanton cruelty, that it sees no promise, no grace, but God beginning with a law to repress already ripened wickedness; a system which ignores the fall, yet sees only wanton cruelty, and wilfulness of temper in an infant; and begins God's history after some 2,500 years resulting in a plague of wickedness, to ignore the flood.

I believe in a revelation which contains an external law, brought in by the bye to test man, and shew him what he was, but, is a revelation of grace, life, redemption, the revelation of the Son of God, of God himself, bringing down heavenly things which the human heart cannot spell out or divine if unrevealed; which brings a revealed God and light to man; and man, made fit for it by love, into the perfect light by redemption, and gives him a new nature capable of enjoying it, and soon, how soon One only knows, glory out of this world; a revelation through which (to close what I have to say in the blessed words of Scripture, how does it meet everything;) those who have received it instead of learning from heathens—own, in moral uprightness, the ruin of the old man, and have put it off, and have put on the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of Him that created him; where there is neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free; but Christ is all, and in all.

W. I am uncommonly glad I met you. The system is a judged one for me. It is not of God. It is evidently exalting man and heathenism at the expense of Christ. I am not master of all the points to which you have referred, but I see enough to have the distinct conviction of the hollowness of the system, even as to facts. But how happy it is that the Scripture itself gives so fully all that is needed, not only to save, but to make a man wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Christ Jesus, and then thoroughly furnished unto all good works.

It must be distracting and defiling to wade through these mythological systems, with all their aberrations and pollutions, but with the holy judgment of God, the Word of God in a few short verses, tells us all its history. How admirable this is; how evidently one sees the hand and Spirit of God in it. There certainly is a stamp in the Word of God of what is Divine, which is unmistakeable, even where it is most human.

H. In truth there is; a simplicity, a dignity,—no one ever produced anything like it. You have only to read Apocryphal books. There is effort in them. There is none in Scripture. Not once do you find an epithet attached to Jesus, (that were a human feeling, perhaps a right one,) but what He is to tell its own tale of what He is. What human writer in recording His history, would have kept uniformly to this. Yet how it becomes a divine person. Every epithet would lower. They may be put as the expression of my sentiment, but not as the cause of them. And how it has forced man to deal with it. Infidels or not, they must deal with it where it is. It is God telling us in grace, but telling us of Himself, telling of heavenly things, and for man. What can man do? It concerns him. He may be angry with the grace, angry to be forced to say he does not like what is heavenly, may exalt heathenism which has been tired of itself; but there it is, he has to say to it. Blessed they who have tasted that God is in it, speaks in it, and that have found Him to be Holy, as He must be, but love in revealing Himself to them, and in bringing them by redemption and Divine righteousness to Himself to enjoy Him for ever. But we must part, dear friend, in the common enjoyment, I trust, of this hope.

W. Shall we not meet again, and take these questions up? There are more of these Essays, and we may find means, through God's grace, to get profit in weighing them in the light, particularly as these questions are current.

H. Perhaps God may permit it to be so. We have gone over, I believe, the fundamental questions as to it. I am, as you know, constantly occupied with more direct work. Yet I fully recognise the importance of these subjects. These Essays, which seem to me very superficial, are but the sign of a state of feeling of a large class, or they would not be worth notice. It is an effort of Satan to pervert and really heathenize the country, and swamp revealed religion. It is going on everywhere in Christendom. The attempted counteraction of ordinances, whether Stahl and Hengstenberg, in Germany, or what is called Puseyism in England, cannot meet the wants of a soul, even though there may be personal piety, which is anything but required for that system. In France it is the ultramontane system, which is the counter balance. In the feeble Protestantism which is there, there is none. It is infidelity, or the new evangelical party infected with rationalism, with many individual pious persons. But I shall see you, and if leisure permits me, will take up any further questions that may occur.

I would refer you in parting, you who do believe in the Word of God, to 1 John v., where the exactly opposite view to Dr. Temple on every point is given. For this is the will of God, that we keep His commandments. There is obedience to a commandment, the proof of love; and His commandments are not grievous. For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the world. There is a new nature, and the world not educated, but overcome. Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? There is faith on a perfect external revealed object, the only means of obtaining the victory. At the end of the third chapter you will find, as in Rom. viii., the Spirit, the Holy Ghost given, carefully distinguished from the spirit or conscience within. Christianity is a deliverance sent by God to form the spirit according to a new life on an object supremely blessed without, so as to take out of self, and fix the heart on that supreme object of blessedness. Dr. Temple and the rationalist system, a rejection of that for the spirit or fallen nature of man to form itself by heathenism and Christianity as pretty nearly on a par, the latter being reduced by him to within a shade of the level of the former.

If you would have blessing or holy and divine affections, hold fast the revelation of a divine object, and the divine revelation of that object.

WHAT HAS THE BIBLE TAUGHT?

OR,

W. I am glad to meet you again. Though the subject was a painful one in some respects, I enjoyed the conversation we had when we last met. It embraced a large field of view: and though we could only step from mountain top to mountain top, and look down into the rich valleys below, still it showed me there were such, and I see we possess a goodly country where I saw little before, but rock or misty mountain. Scripture has something of another aspect to me, as a whole. Could we not continue our researches in examining some of the other Essays? I have been interested in this new science of geology, and you are aware how the cosmogony of Scripture has been attacked, the genesis of the world.

H. I shall most gladly accept your proposal: I cannot pretend to be a very scientific geologist, but the very objections of infidels you have referred to have made me examine it in the results professed to be arrived at, if I have not the science of details. These would require one to consecrate, to say the least, a large portion of a life to it, and the kindred sciences of comparative anatomy, and natural history, and of scientific botany, and this I neither can nor would I do; but our main object will be Scripture, and to tell you the honest truth, while these Essayists are very ignorant of Scripture, I have not learnt to trust the depth of their science on any point. But our object will be: Is the Scripture, viewed as a Divine revelation, inconsistent with the facts discovered in the earth's structure? I do not say, with the conclusions of geologists, for it will be found that these are not very solid. The discoveries are full of interest, the results extremely uncertain. But some collateral subjects will meet us, which will diversify our conversation. You must always remember, that it is the habit of rationalist infidels to assume, that what their doctors, or rather doubters, have laid down as hypotheses, are admitted truths. Things as unfounded as possible. It is one of the commonest deceits of the system to allude to in passing, as to an admitted truth, what, if they had to prove it, they would find themselves at an utter loss to do so. It is settled, universally recognized, an admitted truth, merely means that German rationalists have satisfied themselves, or pretend to have done so, even if that be the case. We first find in the Essay you refer to, the ignorant and stupid theory of Elohist and Jehovistic documents. Now I should have no difficulty in supposing 2, 20, or 20,000 documents, provided I have God's relation of the matter out of them. Human instrumentality I can admit to any extent, provided I have Divine certainty, and Divine intention. These are necessary to my accepting anything as a revelation, because a revelation must flow from the intention of God to make known, and what He makes known, is made known with certainty, and as He meant it to be presented to my mind. It is not that all contained in a revelation is right. I may have the devil's words, wicked men's words, imperfect men's words; but I must have all these things presented to me exactly as God meant them to be presented to me, and His own words besides. The account given must have His authority. The use of the word revelation in this paper on the Mosaic cosmogony is,

I cannot say, merely as loose, but as nonsensical as anything I ever read. If such a use of terms be allowed, we may use any word about anything, and find we have one of Ossian's grey skirts of the mist, instead of our lost friend. What do you think a revelation, a Divine revelation, is ?

W. Well, I suppose something that God has revealed.

H. Ignorant man that you are, why, you are a plain Englishman. You do not know German depths, still less German depths brought to the surface in English vessels.

A revelation does not mean a revelation at all. It means, ' God made use of imperfectly informed men (for the plan of providence for the education of man is a progressive one) to lay the foundations of that higher knowledge, for which the human race is destined.' ' Is it wonderful, therefore, that they have committed themselves to assertions not in accordance with facts ?' ' As imperfect men have been used (in this progressive scheme) as the agents for teaching mankind, is it not to be expected that their teachings should be partial, and to some extent erroneous ?'

W. Well, but then men could give no more than they knew themselves, and that is not a revelation, or else God gave it, revealed it, and then it was from Him, and had His authority stamped on it as His truth.

H. You are all out again. ' It has been popularly assumed that the Bible, bearing the stamp of Divine authority, must be complete, perfect, and unimpeachable in all its parts.'

W. Well, but how could it bear the stamp of Divine authority, if God did not give it ? You cannot make the notions of a particular time at which men had arrived, and erroneous ones, a revelation. It is simply absurd to talk of the stamp of God's authority, when they are merely the fancies of men. Why then the Ptolemaic system is a revelation.

H. No, no ; you are all wrong again. 'The humble scholar is willing to accept such teaching as it hath pleased Divine providence to afford. To do otherwise is presuming to point out how God ought to have instructed man. But if we regard the Mosaic narrative as the speculation of some Hebrew Descartes or Newton, promulgated in all good faith as the best and most probable account that could be then given of God's universe, it resumes the dignity and value of which the Theological Geologists have done their utmost to deprive it.'

W. But what dignity or value is there in the errors of men ignorant of all true science, or how can that bear the stamp of Divine authority ?

H. Ah ! you are not initiated.

W. Well, but God, according to this theory, made use of men to teach error. Why should He stamp that with His authority ? Let them write for themselves, or at least, God not give His authority to it.

H. Why, you see, the education of man was to be progressive, so He must begin, I suppose, in their infancy, by teaching them error. It is not for you to guess of His methods of providence, and then in that age 'the early speculator was harassed by no scruples as to asserting as facts what he knew only as probabilities. He asserts, indeed, solemnly and unhesitatingly, that for which he must have known he had no authority. But the difficulty as to this arises only from our modern habits of thought. Modesty of assertion is taught only by the true spirit of science'; but then these things are better done now, of course.

W. But then modern science is not a revelation, but founded on discovery, and the Mosaic narrative is merely an obsolete, an erroneous supposition, when the truth was not discovered.

H. To be sure, and that for our Essayist, is a revelation.

W. But is it honest to call that a revelation ?

H. Honest ! what a strange word. This way of using language so as to save appearances, though it be not what the word means, arises from our modern habits of thought. It is the true spirit of science. "It is the free handling, in a becoming spirit, of subjects peculiarly liable to suffer by the repetition of conventional language, and from traditional methods of treatment."

W. Well, but speaking of revelation is the repetition of conventional language.

H. Yes, no doubt of it ; but the use of it is the becoming spirit, and the rest the free handling.

W. But this seems to me profoundly immoral, in the highest and deepest sense, to talk of revelation and deal thus.

H. Oh ! 'our respect for the narrative, which has played so important a part in the culture of our race, need in no wise be diminished.' 'For ages this simple view of creation satisfied the wants of man, and both its consistency and grandeur may be preserved, if we recognize in it, not an authentic utterance of Divine knowledge, but a human utterance, which it hath pleased providence to use, in a special way, for the education of mankind.'

W. But this is a deliberate denial of revelation. Providence uses what man has uttered.

H. Yes ; and see what a convenient word Providence is, because there is no sign how it came to be used. As to the education of mankind, it is a bubble we have already seen burst ; for none but those who received it as an absolute revelation of God (God providentially leading them, we are to suppose, to believe this lie) ever were educated at all. The heathen had their own cosmogonies, which it may be worth comparing ; and we have got geologists to settle ours, or at least unsettle what was supposed true. Rabbin and fathers may have believed, in their superstition, the Mosaic account. The whole thing was a happy mistake, into which Providence led them, nobody knows how ; a singular operation of Providence to make man believe a lie, and that a false account was its own utterance.

W. Do you know anything of Cosmogonies ?

H. Well, popularly ; but we may say in general, that the immense fact of creation was unknown to the heathen. "By faith, we understand," says the Epistle to the Hebrews, "that the things which are seen were not made of the things which do appear." What we now feel must have been, was repelled by all the proud reasoners. A poor obscure, ignorant Hebrew alone knew it. For all others, ex nihilo nil fit, was the practical maxim. That is a striking fact. What are the cosmogonies of other nations ? Never, as I said, a creation. Matter was eternal. In India, it was Pantheism. God was the soul of the world : or human passions were perfected into powerful and mysterious beings, moved in chaos, or in darkness ; and systems impossible for our cold western reason to grasp, were concocted. But a personal God, and a creation did not enter into their minds. Brahm was at ease, asleep in the unconscious enjoyment of this state. He woke up, and the mundane egg split, the upper part became heaven and the lower earth. Their more serious philosophical views were, "The universe is Brahm, it comes from Brahm, it subsists in Brahm, and returns into Brahm." All the rest is a kind of Maya or illusion. It is only Brahm revealing himself in various ways, first disengaging a female from himself, and then by emanations of gods who have each their goddesses, and thence into all nature ; —Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, and so on, identified with created existence while Brahm is awake, and which perishes by a great catastrophe when he is tired. The Kalpa, then, is over, and he goes to sleep, and the same story (for they had not learned Dr. Temple's philosophy), exactly, is reproduced over again. In this way, what our Essayist calls Providence, provided for the education of an immensely greater number of the human race than it did by the Hebrew Descartes. It was Pantheism connected with the powers of nature, and the idea of decay and reproduction. So that the destroyer, Siva, was the god of life. The female deities were the productive power of the gods they were connected with, while the history of Adam and Eve, whose very names were used, and Noah and his sons, ran through it all ; and even the names of Shem, Ham, and Japhet, in Sama, Cama, and Prajapati. The "a" at the end not being sounded, and "Pra," meaning Lord.

In the laws or institutes of Menu, we have it directly stated, that the sole self-existing power having willed to produce various beings from his own divine substance, he divided his own substance, and the mighty power became male and female. This gives, perhaps, the most complete original system of idolatry which exists, its most stupid and earthly form being Grecian mythology, but the same was really current everywhere. You can see these things, if you are anxious, in Guigniaut's Kreuzer or Faber, and the Asiatic Researches, and in many curious facts in Bryant. Wilkinson for Egypt, and Cory's Fragments, for Orphic and Phenician.

In more modern less metaphysical theories, matter was eternal. I will give you the Phenician one by Sanchoniatho preserved by Eusebius. I give the quotations of it from Cory's volume. He supposes that the beginning of all things was a dark and condensed windy air, or a breeze of thick air, and a chaos turbid and black as Erebus, and that these were unbounded, and for a long series of ages destitute of form ; but when this wind became enamoured of its own first principles, and an intimate union took place, that connexion was called pathos (cupid or desire), and this was the beginning or origin of the creation of all things ; but it knew not its own creation, but from its connexion with the wind (or spirit), was produced Môt. This, some call Ius (mud), but some the putrefaction of a watery mixture, and from this was produced all the rest of creation, and the generation of all things. He then proceeds to details.

The Egyptian was more strictly mythology, not cosmogony, though in ancient systems these are, indeed, the same. The unity of Deity, or subsistence, does not appear; but their Vedas, the books of Hermes Trismegistus are lost. But it was essentially the same as the Hindoo, save that the system common to both, had adapted itself to the circumstances of the country. It was a more terrestrial and less imaginative system. Human nature took a tinge less kindly, but more righteous. The Unity of the Deity was less in relief. Decay and return to life more prominent, and generation more than emanation, though these were all found in both. The original Deity, Nef, or the Spirit, came down more into the ordinary rank of gods than Brahm; and while the eight great gods and goddesses were found in both, yet a triad of another kind was prominent—male, female, and child, as Nef, Saté, and Khonso—Osiris, Isis, and Horus. The former the more active principle, the second the passive or earth (the great mother as everywhere), and the order produced out of these. The latter triad, the Nile, or sun, for Osiris was both in certain respects, i.e., not the sun as sun, but its action on the Nile and Egypt for blessing. Isis Egypt, and Horus the return to blessing after Typhon, or the burning sun had dried all up. There are traces of one divine origin, out of which all proceeded, but having no book like the institutes of Menu, it is comparatively speaking lost. Ptha, though a great god, and the formative power, was in a certain sense a secondary one. He formed more than was an origin of all things. The Phenician system was more historical and mythic. In all, the worship of Yoni Lingams attached to Siva, the same with Khem, and the history of Osiris, and Phallic processions of Bacchus were from Hindostan to Rome, the origin of a degradation of ideas and manners, which need not be recalled; but it is universally recognized, that creation was unknown in these systems. There was pantheistic emanation, or eternal matter. The Gnostic systems evidently linked themselves up with all this. An effort of Satan to bring the old mythology spiritualized into Christianity. This I shall beg leave to call the devil's education of the world. The point of departure being an idea of one God, which man can hardly get rid of, he turned it by false human wisdom into idolatry, by deifying attributes, powers of nature, stars, and ancestors. All this was afloat in the world before Moses' account of things. There were traces of primæval history both of Adam, Noah, Babel, the giants, and the judgment of Babel, but all turned into idolatry. When this ripened, God gave a divine account, perfectly suited to the age, not science, which would have been unsuited to divine action, but rescuing the great facts in such a way, that the divine actings necessary for man to know morally, and as far, therefore, as they concerned man on the earth,—with which he had to do, should be distinctly set out, and with the simplicity, dignity, and beneficence towards man, which bore the stamp of God. The whole world is witness that no man, neither the simplest nor the wisest, ever could have known, or ever did discover, such a thought as to creation as is given in Genesis. It stands not pre-eminent, but isolated and alone; short, simple, unscientific, no mental elaboration, no recognition of nature's powers (such as Jews fell into, not only in the gross way of idolatry, but in the refined Alexandrian system of Philo), no emanation or pantheism, no eternal matter, no deification of mythic ideas. No visible world counted for the Logos, as again Philo; every human thought is denied, but the fiat of God himself brings the world into existence, and every thing into order; and the relationships of God, the world, and man, are perfectly established. Had there been no cosmogonies, the value of this statement would not have been felt. The simplest mind would have known the truth, but the truth meets every error of every mind.

Let us just look after the poor conceptions and wild imaginations of heathen cosmogonies, at the simple statement of the word of God. We shall see at once, in the former, the laborious efforts of the human mind in what it cannot reach, heaping up powers and conceptions to fill the imagination, and account for effects, because it does not know God, and is oppressed with the effect of His power, and on the other, God speaking with the simplicity of one who had made it all, and knew it all. The word that had made could tell what it had done, and creation takes its place of a mere creature, and Elohim maintains His own.

W. Before you go further, I should like to hear what you say to the two alleged accounts of creation, Elohistick and Jehovistic.

H. From Genesis to Revelation, there are two ways of speaking of God, either as the one divine being in contrast with men, God known as God (only that it is applied to the representatives of His power as such, whether angels or judges hold that place); or in known revealed relationships with men. Of these relationships there are three, Almighty, Jehovah, and Father; the last never revealed till Christ the Son came. Elohim was revealed to Abram as Almighty. He was to trust in Him in that character. It was to be the effect of faith. To Israel, He was revealed as Jehovah, and He was to be known and trusted as such. To us, as Father, and especially as Holy Father, in which name He keeps us, and we who have believed in the Son, know and trust Him. Thus, in Exodus vi., Elohim specially tells Moses that He had revealed himself to the fathers by His name El Shaddai, God Almighty, but not by that of Jehovah, which He now took with Israel ; and Christ particularly notices that He had manifested the Father's name to the disciples, had declared and would declare it, the Holy Ghost becoming a spirit of adoption in us. Hence the apostle beautifully connecting all these revelations of God, says (2 Cor. vi. 18,) I will be a Father to you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. That is, He who had been the God of Abraham as Almighty, and the God of Israel as Jehovah, now took his name and place of Father. Surely, He was ever Father in respect of the Son, ever Almighty, and ever Jehovah ; but He had not taken it as a name of known relationship. Now there is never, in any case, confusion in this respect. In the Psalms, the difference is of the deepest interest, and when understood, greatly facilitates reading them with intelligence. It is equally true now. God I may seek as God, thirst after as God, bow to as such. With a Father, I am in sweet and blessed relationship, according to the terms of that name. It was not in vain that Christ said, I go to my Father and your Father, my God and your God. During this life, He ever said, Father. On the cross, My God, my God : perfect in faith, yet not enjoying the relationship. After His resurrection He uses both according to the full perfectness in which He now stands in them according to redemption, and introduces His disciples in virtue of that into the same. Hence, too, when all was finished, even in the act of dying, He says, Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. Now if you examine the second chapter of Genesis, from verse 4, you will see that nothing but the utmost prepossession could speak of it as a second account of the creation. Have you ever looked at it in this point of view ?

W. I have not. I have, of course, often read it ; but for positive instruction, not to meet any particular doctrine.

rationalistic assertions, never accept them without reading the passage in question, because thus the Divine intention of the passage is, with God's help, present to the mind, and in nine cases out of ten that suffices to make all their assertions utterly null. It is the case here. In the first chapter, and three verses of the second, we have the simple but magnificent account, and magnificent because simple, of the creation of all things, and the orderings of the earth, the world, as subjected to man and in reference to him. This was God creating. In the rest of the second chapter, we have the sacred historian entering into all the special circumstances in which man was placed in this world. He alludes to the fact of the rest of the creation subsisting without man, then speaks of the Garden being planted in Eden, of the tree of knowledge of good and evil, how man was made and became a living soul, by which his special relationship to God existed, of the forming of Eve out of his rib, of his dominion over all animals. These and other circumstances being taken as symbolical expressions of higher things all through Scripture. In a word, we have passed out of creation into the whole scene of moral, mysterious, and symbolical relationships between God and man. It is, first, responsibilities in an historical way, and then the figures of all the blessings and rights to come in and be conferred on man in the second Adam. I am not now arguing whether the application be just or not which subsequent Scriptures make of this history; but to say it is a second account of the creation is simple nonsense. Not one subject in chapter two, except the fact that a man was created and a woman, is spoken of in chapter one. The fact that there were plants without a man is mentioned in chapter one, and these are spoken of in chapter two in a wholly different aspect, and carrying the subject on to a further point. Now, it was of the last importance that he who wrote for Israel should shew, that Jehovah, the God revealed to them, was the one supreme and only Elohim, the Creator, though He was their national God; and this the account most fully does. The first chapter shews, that it was simple Elohim, God, the only one; the second, that when special conditions of man came out, that one Elohim was Jehovah, the God of Israel. Had he put Jehovah in the first, it might have been only the particular national God known by that name. But it was Elohim, God. There was none but He. Had he omitted it in the second, it might not have been the God of the Jews at all. Had he laboriously affirmed it, it might have been a national assumption: the simple statement left it in its own eternal truth. So, when the great truth was restored under Elijah, the convinced people shout, Jehovah, He is Elohim! Jehovah, He is Elohim! The question being, whether Baal was Elohim, or Jehovah. It would be well we should read the chapters; it will bring them, in the way I said, before our minds, and the contrast with the deplorable cosmogonies of the heathen by which in fact the world was educated (and cosmogony and theology were identical); and the bearing and relationship of the two chapters will become evident.

In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters. And God said, Let there be light: and there was light. And God saw the light, that it was good: and God divided the light from the darkness. And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

And God said, Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so. And God called the firmament Heaven. And the evening and the morning were the second day.

And God said, Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas ; and God saw that it was good. And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth : and it was so. And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind ; and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the third day.

And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night ; and let them be for signs and for seasons, and for days, and years : and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth : and it was so. And God made two great lights ; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night : he made the stars also. And God set them in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth, and to rule over the day and over the night, and to divide the light from the darkness : and God saw that it was good. And the evening and the morning were the fourth day. And God said, Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life, and fowl that may fly above the earth in the open firmament of heaven. And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind : and God saw that it was good. And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply in the earth. And the evening and the morning were the fifth day.

And God said, Let the earth bring forth the living creature after his kind, cattle, and creeping thing, and beast of the earth after his kind : and it was so. And God made the beast of the earth after his kind, and cattle after their kind, and every thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind : and God saw that it was good.

And God said, Let us make man in our own image, after our likeness : and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth. So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him ; male and female created he them. And God blessed them, and God said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it : and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth.

And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in the which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed ; to you it shall be for meat. And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein

there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so. And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.

Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.

These are the generations of the heavens and of the earth when they were created, in the day that the LORD God made the earth and the heavens, and every plant of the field before it was in the earth, and every herb of the field before it grew: for the LORD God had not caused it to rain upon the earth, and there was not a man to till the ground. But there went up a mist from the earth, and watered the whole face of the ground. And the LORD God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life; and man became a living soul.

And the LORD God planted a garden eastward in Eden; and there he put the man whom he had formed. And out of the ground made the LORD God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; and the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx stone. And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia. And the name of the third river is Hiddekel: that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates. And the LORD God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it, and to keep it. And the LORD God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat: but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.

And the LORD God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him. And out of the ground the LORD God formed every beast of the field, and every fowl of the air; and brought them unto Adam to see what he would call them: and whatsoever Adam called every living creature, that was the name thereof. And Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowl of the air, and to every beast of the field; but for Adam there was not found an help meet for him. And the LORD God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; and the rib, which the LORD God had taken from man, made he a woman, and brought her unto the man. And Adam said, This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh. And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed.

How refreshing is the Word after all the cavillings of men!

W. It is most truly so; but I seize your remarks on the different relationships in which God reveals Himself with men. It opens a wide field of interest in the study of Scripture, and I see that it rests on the plain testimony of Scripture itself. I confess I begin to think these essayists and rationalists excessively superficial; they seem always to rest in the mere outside of Scripture, and in no case to get hold of the mind of God in it.

H. Naturally enough, they set out by not believing there is one; and the truth is, as Scripture states it, the god of this world has blinded the eyes of them that believe not. They think themselves wiser than apostles, exclude God from the whole matter, and, of course, sink to their own level.

W. The passage from 2 Corinthians has singular beauty in respect of these relationships.

H. It is indeed of exquisite beauty; and these connections of Scripture, which unfold a whole scene of moral truths and elements, diverse in themselves, yet revealing the full force each of the other; and thus related in the deepest way one to another, bringing out what God is, and evolving in the revelation of it, every exercise of the human heart towards God, shew a Divine unity of mind in Scripture, which all the petty cavils of essayists cannot shake. That one verse embraces all the Divine relations of God, and the dispensational connections of man with Him, and takes them all up to introduce them, though as isolated relationships quite different from one another in their abstract power, into that one new perfect one which has been revealed as the perfection of grace through Christ. But He hides these things from the wise and prudent, and reveals them unto babes. The moral need of the soul, the wants of a new nature, it is by which we get to understand Scripture, not our intellectual powers. But let us turn to our geology.

W. Well, how do you reconcile the Mosaic account of the creation with geological discoveries ?

H. To tell you the honest truth, I think the Mosaic account of the creation much more certain than any geological system. First, the direct proofs of Scripture are, to me, infinitely more solid and sure than any geological conclusions ; and the geological conclusions I have seen arrived at, seem to me to rest in fact on very doubtful evidence.

W. But surely there are a number of well-ascertained facts and principles ?

H. There are a number of facts which to me at least are of the highest possible interest. But (perhaps my mind is slow and apt to see difficulties, and not to come to a conclusion before they are cleared up) the results put together into a system are to my mind surrounded with difficulty. I have no disposition to controvert extraordinary facts. If it is proved to me that the tomb of Mahomet in the Caaba is suspended in the air, I say very well, I may be able to explain it, or I may not, and if so I wait till I can. If a man can cause a table to be suspended in the air, it is to me a mere question of physical fact—is there such a power ? Lifting my hand is just as wonderful in itself. I believe that in a certain sense the physical world is subject to man, and, if God allow him, I know no limit to his employing the powers of nature. Miracle is divine power over nature, the will of God in exercise not ordinarily but extraordinarily, whoever may be the person who brings that will into play. The powers used are, to my mind, immaterial ; they may be natural or supernatural ; but when natural powers are in exercise according to the prescribed course of things, there is no miracle. The power exercised may be as great, or greater, but it is the ordinary course of nature. But when not in that course, even though it be the same power, but by an extraordinary occasional action of the Divine will, any event is produced, that is a miracle. If I remember right I am repeating the idea of John Wessal, Luther's fore-runner; but I must not make him responsible for it; but I think I owe it to him. Of course, if the power itself is absolutely supernatural as raising the dead, that itself proves a miracle.

W. I think, at any rate, the idea of miracle is just; it is one which has been a good deal discussed. It is referred to in these Essays.

H. It is. Take an example. A mighty East wind was a natural power at the Red Sea; yet it was a miracle, because it was an extraordinary exercise of the Divine will, just as much as at Jordan, though there the river was arrested in its course supernaturally; i.e., by no known natural cause. However, I am ready to admit any extent of power over natural objects subjected to him by God being exercised by man. If he has found a means of making a table rap on the ground, the only question with me is, is it a power given to man? If he pretends to bring souls up, I do not believe it; because I do not believe God has put the souls of the deceased in his power. He may have devils deluding him, pretending to be the souls of the dead; but souls are in God's keeping, and cannot come unless He bring them.

W. And what do you make of the witch of Endor?

H. God brought up Samuel I do not doubt a moment; the woman was as frightened as Saul at his coming. Now the discovery of geological remains, and the theories of successive formations, are full of interest, and there are strong grounds to believe there have been such; nor can I see that the Deluge accounts for all, because if—but it is if—the upheaval theory be correct, which I have nothing to oppose to, then the mountains which existed at the time of the Deluge have broken up strata which had various fossils already buried in them; that is, the Flood does not appear to have brought them, while unconformable strata prove deposits after the upheaval. Thus there is a proof of strata of different ages. But I am not satisfied entirely as to all the data. If the present surface of land were submerged, and there were fossil English and fossil Australian remains, the Marsupia and duck-billed Platybuses of Australia would be treated as proofs of a necessarily anterior formation, because the Marsupia are an inferior class of Mammalia, a transition order. The proofs might exist, I admit; but as far as this goes, why do Marsupian fossils prove in themselves an anterior formation? superposition may, but remains do not. Again, in the Wealden formation, fresh water remains are found and salt too, and I think alternating, and turtles. Well, this is a great difficulty. It is concluded that it must have been an estuary in a large bay;—all very ingenious. It is alleged, however, after disputes between the chalk and jurassic or oolites, to belong to the Jura sea. But then, if it belong to either, according to the ablest geologists, as Vogt, who adopts the idea of the estuary and the Jura sea, there could have been no great river there at that time, nor a bay into which it ran, according to the limits which geological data give of dry land and the Jura sea. But there are more serious objections. It is alleged that for certain sandstones some twenty thousand years must have passed to have a bed of such thickness deposited; but at Craighleith, near Edinburgh, a tree some sixty feet long, lies slanting at an angle of  $40^{\circ}$  across the strata in its whole length. Now that a tree remained 20,000 years slanting thus, while the sea deposited this strata, is not to be believed. Again, they tell us that the formation of certain beds of coal would require 2,000 years to make a bed of coal a foot thick, and some 120,000 for the coal measures of England. Now one used to bogs may well doubt this. You may find some 10 or 12 feet of bog formed in a comparatively short time, as in Ireland; in cut-down forests, in a quarter of the time. A particular kind of grass has always turf at the roots, if only a single plant; and I have seen trees retaining their form, but grown through by the roots of grass, forming the whole into a compact mass little different from coal. Where water is found the progress is very rapid. In Lincolnshire I have understood that the number of the legion who cut down the forest has been found in the bog. Nor is this all; at South Joggins' cliff, in Nova Scotia, and somewhere near Manchester, sigillaria grow through the coal, the roots being in and below it, and the stems rising up in their original position through the superincumbent sandstone and shale. So in the Isle of Purbeck, dicotyledonous wood in limestone. Even Phillips says, 'the nearly vertical position of certain fossil plants, a phenomenon by no means rare among sandstone rocks, affords good ground for caution in assigning very great extension of years to geological periods, the accumulation of transported sediment must have been so rapid as to prevent the decomposition of the vertical portions of the plants. No one doubts that the bed of stone three feet thick which encloses equisetum columnare at High Whitby, was laid by a single inundation; and again the sigillaria in the coal sandstones of Yorkshire pass through more than one, sometimes four or five beds of stone.' Such facts as these subvert, as far as I can judge, the whole system of geologists as to deposits. Again it was a settled point, that human remains, according to the known geological progress of orders of fossil Fauna, could not be found in any deposits before our present world. The human petrifaction from Guadaloupe, in the British Museum, was held to be recent, as were some since discovered;

but the question after all remains if that is just. At any rate, the whole theory seems upset now. It is alleged that in Brazil and in North America, (in the last case in so old a deposit as old red sandstone), unequivocal human remains have been discovered in strata too old for them, according to geological systems. In the caves of Gaylenreuth, they are mixed up with fossil remains of species, belonging to anterior formations; and at Mialet, in a cavern in which the hunted pastors of the églises du désert found constant refuge, and a place of common meeting and resort, human bones, and those of the cave bear and others, have been found. But here, both rude Roman and still ruder Celtic implements have been found. Dr. Phillips says as to this, "he will not hazard a definite conclusion." "In the meantime we may remark that the principal arguments for the co-eval existence of man, and extinct pachy-dermata and carnivora in the south of France, are the intimate mixture and equal conservation of the bones. And these arguments should not be slighted, for they would probably not have been resisted in any case of the mixture of quadrupedal remains." Since all this, however, rude instruments, constructed by human skill, have been discovered in drift of an epoch, according to geologists, very long anterior to that in which man ought to be found. I think in the Eocene formation. But the facts and data as to this are anything but clearly ascertained. One celebrated naturalist has, on his own data, according to the President of the Geological Society, made the period required forty thousand times too long. A man who makes mistakes of this kind on very simple questions discredits all his reasoning. But all his data are denied by Sir R. Murchison. Further, as to the remains in the drift, or diluvium, the great proof of antiquity are the remains of extinct mammalia at any rate of Pliocene date, as Hippopotamus major and Elephas antiquus, and some others. But those who maintain the antiquity of man are obliged to admit that the question remains. Are not these animals of more recent date? As Mr. Lubbock admits "we may do this by bringing these animals down to a later period, as well as by carrying man back to an earlier one." Now in point of fact some animals which have been insisted on as proofs of Pliocene age have been found in far more recent, such as post glacial deposits. Bos longifrons and Elephas primigenius clearly much later still. I have no hesitation in saying that all the data require far fuller examination, and that nothing is yet proved. As it has been said, "He knows most who believes least." The haste with which conclusions are drawn is unscientific. The alleged colonies of Mr. Barrande in Bohemia, also inconsistent with the due succession of Fauna, and alleged to be carried there by currents require evidently more explanation.

W. And what conclusions do you draw from these facts?

H. None; save that geologists, as Lyell has admitted, are but on the threshold of the science. That the conclusions of the earth's antiquity, and of the formation of strata cannot be sustained, and that we must wait for further light and additional facts, before any conclusion can be drawn.

W. That is a most lame and impotent conclusion.

H. Better to wait till I have adequate grounds to judge, than bewilder myself by premature assertions. There is another point, whether Lyell's system of the progressive effect of subsisting causes, acting with the power which they yet do, or that of other geologists of great catastrophes is the right one. Our Essayists embrace Lyell's, and of course treat it as a settled point, as they ever do when it suits them. I judge with many, I believe most English geologists, that, admitting the possibility of catastrophes, in general similar powers have been in operation, but in a far higher degree. It is absurd to compare the elevation of a mountain, such as Jorullo in Mexico, of 1600 feet high, formed in 1759, with the Alps, Pyrenees, Himalayas, or its own kindred Cordilleras. Sir R. Murchison justly warns his readers more than once against comparing them. He calls them infinitely more intense.

W. But why should they find that suit them ?

H. Because then miracles, by a faint analogy, are merged in the operation of ordinary causes.

W. Dear, what a poor and unsolid foundation to build on.

H. Yes, but it shuts out a living intervention of God in men's matters, and that is their great object. God may give an impulsion, but the intervention or intercourse with a living God does not suit the dignity or independence of man.

W. In result, where do you think, supposing there are Hypozoic, and Palæozoic, and Mesozoic, and Kainozoic periods, they come in in the first of Genesis ?

H. I have no kind of a priori opinion or moral objection to the system of the days being lengthened periods, but it seems to me somewhat forced ; McCausland's, a barrister of Dublin, is the cleverest book on the subject. And I have heard another thought expressed by a Christian friend, that the day is an actual day, the state produced by it being of unqualified duration ; but I was not persuaded by it. The structure of the chapter itself, and the connection of the parts lead me to take it, after the first verse, as a statement of the formation of our present world, or κοσμος. Once we have seen the laborious efforts at cosmogony which occupied the heathen world, and that not one ever arrived at the simple fact of a creation, the force of Heb. xi. 3, becomes obvious ; one sentence of revelation from God settled what all the profound elaborations of man never could arrive at ; and what is not very much to the honour of man's intellect, once the fact is stated there is the consciousness that it could not be otherwise. Yet, instead of the best and most probable account, as the essay calls it, that could be given, it is in absolute opposition to the uniform and universal view of the matter in every known record. Ex nihilo nil fit was the admitted maxim, Nothing can come of nothing, whereas the Divine maxim is, Ex nihilo omne fit. Emanation, or when the Grecian mind would not bear these oriental systems, the eternity of matter, taken for granted, was the only idea men had of the origin of the world. Hence we have, In the beginning Elohim created the heavens and the earth,—not the expanse simply, but in general and absolutely those objects we have before us. Eth hashamaim ve eth haarets. This great truth once laid down—whose importance redemption only surpasses, as indeed it does infinitely,—what concerned man, the earth as we have it, was all man had to be taught by God. It would have been utterly unsuited to give a revelation to teach science, or to allude to it. The phenomena are explained, so far as it is needed to put what man saw before his soul as the work and ordering of God. What came between the first verse and the second, does not enter into the object of the revelation. Creation, and the forming of the present earth did. As regards the words used, Maimonides has discussed them. He refers to Bara, Hasa, Chasa, and Yatsar. The last he affirms is never used of creating out of nothing, the three former may. I do not deny that Bara may be used of what is not formed out of nothing, but it is not used for forming or moulding out of something. Bara speaks of the thing made as the absolute act of the Maker. The one who has simply caused it to be such. Haza refers to the form into which it is put, he made it a man; but Bara, he created a man, or a whale. Yatsar refers directly to the material cause, he moulded something into a form; hence, Yatsar, a potter; Bara refers to the efficient cause, Haza to the formal, Yatsar to the material. Create and make quite sufficiently represent Bara and Haza. I could not say a carpenter created a table, he made it. I could almost say Stephenson created railways, figuratively of course. As to birds being formed out of the water, the margin would have removed the difficulty. The objection is either clap-trap or ignorance; Zung and De Wette have both of them gevögel fliege, let fowl fly, so the excellent Dutch, and Diodati's Italian version; the English has followed the Sept. and Latin; the Hebrew ve yophk yopheph in the second member of the verse seems plain enough. Perhaps remains of ancient prejudices may have led our Essayists to follow the learned Patrick, who says, that it is clear fishes and birds have the same origin, for they both lay eggs, and both guide themselves with their tails.

W. Well, it is naïf enough, at any rate. What strange creatures we are. But you think, then, that the whole geological period, if such there be, comes between verse 1 and 2.

H. Would come; for the object of the chapter is to treat, as I have said, the fact of creation, that everything is made out of nothing, and then our present earth, and nothing else. Hence, in the second verse, He confines himself to the earth. The earth was tohu vohu. There is no idea of the heavens being in this state, and I confess I should not suppose chaos to have been a first creation of God. It looks like the result of some catastrophe. Here all the Orphic, Grecian, and Phenician cosmogonies begin, and the Roman, as in the lines well known to boys, "Ante mare et terras et quod tegit omnia calum Unus erat toto naturæ vultus in orbe, Quem dixere chaos." Only they personify, in general, chaos, and erebus, or darkness; the mundane egg, coming out of the former. We get the historical fact here (primeval creation properly speaking being distinct), chaos; they personify in general chaos, darkness, the waters, and the Vishnu narayana of the Hindoos. (I refer to these only to shew where the traditions fall into the ranks). The Spirit of God moves upon the face of the water. Now comes the fiat of God upon this scene of darkness. Darkness, mark, was only on the face of the deep. And God said, Let there be light, and there was light. He spake, and it was done. This was the great fact. But God distinguished darkness and light, and there was night and day. The how is not said. We can well believe, by the turning of the earth round, which would suppose a fixed light; but God is not teaching science, nor is it mere observation, for observation would have led to speak of the sun, which, every one knows, lights the earth. It is not the most probable account. The difficulty is one unnecessarily created by the writer in apparent divergence from what every one sees and knows. The difficulty overthrows the theory of infidels; the writer departs from the evident and apparent phenomena, not to raise mystic fables, but to state a singular fact gratuitously, if it were not a revelation. Then the expanse is formed, or for a Jew the first heaven, as we see it. God set it over the earth. It is spoken of as we speak of it. Rakiang is an expanse, but there is no definition of it. Firmament is merely a word taken from the Septuagint and Latin. God produced what we see daily, this blue sky over our heads, and call sky, and call heaven. It is not mere empty space, as our Essayist says; all but what the sun shone on would be pitch dark if it were, and the bottom viewed in a telescope is black. It is the air which is blue, yet we all say blue sky, and so on. It sufficed to say, that what was thus before us God had so ordered. I am not aware that the waters above the heavens are more than the supplies of rain in the clouds. It has been alleged, that there was no rain till the deluge, and that these waters came down then. It may be so. I see no proof of it. Earth now comes out of the waste to be fruit-bearing. The notion that there were no heavens till the present sky was formed, the atmospheric heavens, is an utter mistake. We left the heavens as distinct from the earth behind us in the first verse, to speak only of the earth and what referred to it. The notion that there were none till the atmosphere was formed was the heathen idea, as may be seen in Ovid. The Mosaic account is much more just and true, when none else was. It distinguishes the empyrean heavens from the atmospheric heavens. In heathenism, man spoke ; in Scripture, God. The word used for what was now formed, is not what is spoken of in the great act of creation ; it is expanse. But this has the name of heaven, and that only is said, and this is true now. The rakiang is called heaven, and it is quite right it should be. Do I not rightly say, I shall go up to heaven ? I do not excommunicate a man for believing there are antipodes ; but I should think a man who should tell me, I must not say go up to heaven, because my friend in New Zealand or Australia would then go down, a very unprofitable and foolish person. Moral ideas are associated with physically unscientific ones ; and I am afraid we shall speak and sing of the sun's rising and setting, and moon's waxing and waning, though the advanced science of rationalists in the happy age that is coming may have convinced incipient philosophers at National Schools that it is all a mistake, that suns do not set or rise, nor moons wax nor wane. We are set in a system where these phenomena are meant to act on us, a wondrous world of images which are more true than science, because mind is more real than matter. And in moral things, and the Scripture is throughout a moral book, God speaks to us according to this, not according to the, after all, petty discoveries of science. I call it petty, because it is only occupied with material things. All knowledge is the proof of ignorance ; for what a man has learnt he did not know before. Yet, if he has rightly learnt it, it was before, and he did not know it.

W. Is that all you make of man and his powers ?

H. That is all. As Pascal has said, All matter never produced a thought, and all intellect never produced charity. As to the day that is now before us, it is a mistake of the Essayists that fruit-trees and seed-bearing plants are first noticed. Grass, the green herb, is first noticed, which was not given for man's use. Of course the Divine account does not set about botanising, to study what are the best kinds for man or beast. God created all. All are respectively given, and what is best is used. It is the fact of Elohim's making the beautiful clothing of this earth, and trees, and herbs, to reproduce themselves, which is noticed as the great general fact. We now arrive at what is the great difficulty presented to us, but which I have partly anticipated, God's making lights for day and night. I repeat what I said. If this be not a revelation, it is a difficulty gratuitously created for himself by the writer. If it be a revelation, he must give it as he received it; and that explains why it is thus set forth. If it be not a revelation, it is perfectly inexplicable why He should have made light, and lights for day and night distinct things; for every one knows day and night come from the rising and setting of the sun. That it ever was otherwise must be a matter of revelation. But as a phase of truth the difference is great; light in itself is not a light, a governing central power, that has light in it; and it is in this way it is brought before us here. Some doubts have arisen as to the sun's atmosphere, in the mind of the distinguished French astronomer, who observed the last total, or at any rate, annular, eclipse in Spain; but we may take it as an admitted fact, that the sun, as a body, forming a centre of gravity for the planetary system, is not in itself necessarily a light. The reproduction of light, before, was only to dissipate the darkness that brooded on chaos. Now we have a beautiful centre of order identified with light, just as Christ could speak of truth, and say, I am the truth. Nor while taking the historical parts of Scripture as plain facts are their analogies of no import. Imagination may play us false, but that there is a world of images of truth, the stupidest can hardly deny. Scripture is full of it. Language is formed on it. The mind of man is bred and fashioned in it. You must make him a materialist and a brute with physical wants, that is, destroy his higher nature, if you set aside this. You cannot utter a sentence without it, unless on mere material subjects. God has taken this up in the highest way. He is light. The right hand of His power makes all equal. His eyes run to and fro through the earth. No one is deceived by it, no more than they are by going up into heaven. They are taught by it, what is strictly materially inexact gives more truth than the contrary. Destroy it, and God cannot communicate with man, for he has not the same nature: nor man with man, as a moral man. Language, the wonderful, though imperfect expression of thought and feeling, ceases to serve man as a moral being.

W. But you take this Mosaic account of creation as literally true?

H. Undoubtedly; but I do not doubt it is so framed, as the world is of which it speaks, as to furnish images for higher relations. If the facts were not there, the images would not be. If there were no cleanness, I could not speak of the heart being clean, but the last is a figure. Remember this, that science however useful is material. Phenomena, on the contrary, are connected with the higher and divine part of man; and these are for all the world. I do not believe, while no doubt demonstrating the wonderful works of God, that Lord Ross's telescope has awakened a higher feeling than breathed in the heart of the Shepherd of Bethlehem, when in the fields keeping his flock by night, he viewed the heavens, the work of God's hands, the moon and the stars which He had ordained, and God gave him to image out that second and perfect man, as the answer to his wants and aspirations, who should be crowned with glory and honour, and have all things put under his feet. Perhaps the first man may exalt himself by the discoveries which prove how little he is, but what has he gained by it?

I believe fully God set at this time the sun and the moon to be for signs, and seasons, and years, and make day and night, but they are viewed here solely in this aspect towards the earth, and only as lights. God made the two great lights, eth shenee hameoroth, and God gave them as such. There is no creation of the bodies. There is the establishment of the phenomena, and their purpose. Hence, when he speaks of the stars, he only takes care to remind, that God had made them too. Instead of men's worshipping them, God had distributed them to all men under heaven; but as not having any other place with this earth, it is simply left in that way. We have no revelation of the creation of angels. Man, Israel, is to be instructed as to what they were in danger of abusing, and told how it came from God. It is not as Hugh Miller thought, a vision, or the impression of it related, but phenomena put in their right place in man's mind, or God as to the phenomena. And that is what we want.

W. It makes it very simple and infinitely more important when we see it in this light. I quite feel it would be utterly out of place to make of a revelation a course of science. Yet the distinction of creation and the arranging the present order, the κοσμος, of which Moses could have had no natural knowledge, leaves all discoveries of science their own place. It supposes a knowledge of them which God only could have, and yet does not take the mind from what was before it in all ages, and important for the development of truth in all ages, and the true condition of the masses in reference to God and the creation, at all times. In this, I see what is wholly divine in this account. There must be love and purpose in God's revelations; and in revelations to man, that love and that purpose must refer to man while it reveals God, and this the first of Genesis does admirably. It seems to me, as indeed I do not doubt it is, perfect in this respect.

H. Surely it is. And the question between us and the rationalists is, not whether the Scripture gives scientific knowledge—most surely it does not; but whether its contents are God's thoughts or man's thoughts of the subject it treats of. It does give us man's thoughts when man stands responsible (and that of course it must do to have a full moral picture), but God's view and thoughts of all this scene, with the perfection of man in Christ, but a second man. In the case before us, in this most simple account, we have all the needed phenomena on which man speculated ascribed to the right source, and put in their place, and all man's thoughts met. Elsewhere we have man's thoughts, schemes of emanations, personifications, and theories. One little chapter answers them all divinely.

W. I feel thoroughly satisfied as to the divine and perfect character of this account as given by revelation. It seems to me that it bears the stamp of a revelation on itself. The review of human systems shews evidently that it was not the product of man's mind.

H. I would notice only now a few statements of the Essay to shew its fallacy. Many such have been noticed in our general review of the subject. It is stated, that theologians should have accepted frankly the principle, that those things for the discovery of which man has faculties specially provided, are not fit objects for a divine revelation. All quite right; I quite agree with this. But it does not touch the question. I have not even to discover the sun, nor the stars, nor the moon; but what man never did discover, but lost when he had it, was, that God had made the sun, the moon, and stars. Instead of which, man took them for gods, and worshipped them. That God in mercy should give a revelation to deliver man from this, even though he was without excuse, is very worthy of God. But now mark the consequence these reasoners draw: "Had this been unhesitatingly done, either the definition and idea of divine revelation must have been modified, and the possibility of an admixture of error been allowed; or such parts of the Hebrew writings as were found to be repugnant to fact, must have been pronounced to form no part of revelation." Now this conclusion is totally false. If objects of scientific discovery are not proper objects of revelation, the conclusion is not by any means that there is error in Scripture, but that what is a revelation does not set about to reveal them, and therefore has no occasion to be in error about them. The writer's statement amounts to this. There is a revelation which God has given, and as scientific facts are not a proper subject of revelation, therefore there is error in the revelation God has given. I should have thought, as God was the revealer, and THERE COULD BE NO OTHER, that if they were not objects of revelation, He would not have revealed anything about them, not that He must have been in error. If He revealed any thing and there be error, He must have known the truth of it, and have wilfully deceived. If He has not revealed any object of scientific discovery, the position falls to the ground. I have found no revelation of Cephalopodes, or Tribolites, or Megalotheria, Megalosaurias, and Ichthyosaurias or huge Pterodactyls. Man has discovered them. I am not aware of any revelation on an object of science. I find the word of God as to natural things resting on the ground of phenomena, and God correcting the horrible wanderings of men's minds, by revealing Himself, whom man never discovered as the creator of all. Let man resolve nebula with his telescopes, and find they are composed of stars. Scripture tells us that He made the stars also. Let him discover if he can, that the whole world is made up of infusoria, if revelation be not true, he dies and becomes part of it in his turn. We must distinguish between the facts of geology and the conclusions of geologists. I admit the former; the latter are extremely uncertain, in some respects impossible to be true. There is nothing to conciliate, as I have said. The facts of geology are there. Scripture, which does not reveal scientific facts, is totally silent as to them, but leaves a gap which may have been filled by millions of years when we were not: but it does tell us the origin of the world, which no man could find out, so horribly stupid was man without a revelation, namely, that God made it. If He did not, who did? Our writer would have us learn from the history of man what God's procedure has been. History, where? In India, or Egypt, or from the Edda, or Ahriman and Ormuzd? Where am I to find the history? The vast, vast majority of the world were in the most horrible state possible. Is it from that I am to learn God's procedure towards man? Did God give him Kali, and Jugganath, or the Grand Lama, or Khan, and Yoni-Lingams, and Brahms? Where is this procedure? What history is it found in? History! Go to it, and see what man is. I do not say books of philosophy, though they are bad enough, and how truly judged in Rom. ii.; but history, aye, rationalists! history! What a God you must have, if that be His procedure with man. And, alas! our cosmogonists are only returning to what the first of Genesis brought the believer in it out of; for, "here, geology steps in and successfully carries back the history of the world's crust," think of that, "to a very remote period, until it arrives," where do you think? "at a region of uncertainty, where philosophy is reduced to mere guesses and probabilities, and pronounces nothing definite." What a satisfactory result, successfully arriving at uncertainty. How these men tell the truth about themselves. Divine philosophy, occupied with the earth's crust till it successfully arrives at uncertainty; but, if reduced to guesses, it will guess: and, "to this region belong the speculations which have been ventured upon, as to the original concretion of the earth and planets out of nebular matter," is there such a thing? "of which the sun may have been the nucleus." It must have been a prodigious comet, to have been concentrated into the sun, for they have no sensible power of gravity at all; but let that pass. Who made the nebula? The Hindoo could set the world on an elephant, and the elephant on a tortoise, his back was tolerably suited for it; but the tortoise on—a guess perhaps. Mr. Godwin would be greatly benefited by one text of Scripture, in which there is no scientific fact. In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.

As regards carnivorous animals, and one man and one woman, the fact is a question of God's power. It is distinctly stated, that herbs were given for food to the beasts of the field, not clearly from ignorance, for lions were eating men in Moses' time: but, with the deliberate intention of alleging a revelation, Moses contradicts the whole existing order of facts as to animals. He had no need to be a comparative anatomist, to know that there were wild beasts. He declares that at first they were given the green herb for food. Scripture gives to understand they eat that in the ark, and speaks of it as representing the reign of peace. Whether God, who foreknew the fall, made them as they are, or whether they were changed in disposition and internal organization, I do not pretend to say; but I believe man fell the first day; but the passage is not ignorance of science, for no science was needed. It is a direct contradiction of universal experience, and professes to be a revelation. To say that it cannot be true is absurd. It is morally appropriate. All men had a tradition of a golden age of blessing. Plato said, the beasts used to converse then:

“He did not ask Jean Jacques Rousseau
If beasts confabulate or no.”

As regards the single pair, Christ and His apostles, particularly Paul, speak of the first man and woman as alone; and all Paul's doctrine is based on it. I am aware that our essayists, and all their party, think themselves far wiser than the apostles; but, as the same Paul says, not he that commendeth himself is approved. I suppose they would have a little modesty as yet as to treating the Lord as a person of inferior wisdom; but the whole account in both chapters speak, as the Lord says, of one man and one woman. He planted a garden, and there He put the man whom He had formed. He was alone. All the beasts subjected to him, but no companion; and then Eve, taken out of his side: when fallen and driven out, he begat a son in his own image. It is not merely the doctrine of Paul, but the historical statement is as clear as possible. The fall and redemption are all set aside in the part of the essay I allude to. I have already commented on the pretension that it is a second narrative. The whole subsequent history goes on the supposition that there was no other man. The whole moral meaning of the history is a brutum fulmen, if there were others. The history is written to shew an innocent man fallen and driven out, as the head of a race, from God. If this is not so, what does the history mean? Genesis is a book in which all the elements of the Divine history are brought out, and anticipatively passed in review. In the first chapter, the man is carefully spoken of in the singular, and then plural when the woman is added. It is quite evident that all kinds of traditions were afloat in the world as to creation, or formation rather, and when God called out a people, He informed them as to the origin of the world around them, put them into a right relationship to Himself as to it, and only spoke of it as far as that was needed ; but did that knowing everything and speaking according to that knowledge. We may rest in peace in that. Discoveries may interest us deeply, like the discovery of antiquities of Celts or Saxons in an old castle we live in—our own relationship with God flows from the revelation He has made of Himself in Christ. At the same time, according to the ablest enquirers, as Pritchard, Cuvier, and others, all races of men are derived from one stock. The American efforts to show the contrary are excessively poor ; contradictory as to Africa, and false as to America. Their object is to make of negroes another race. Livingstone's facts go to show their physical peculiarities to be a natural result of heat and damp. But I am content to be ignorant of its cause.

W. I am perfectly satisfied. I see as clearly as possible that the light we have in the first of Genesis is of God, that man was incapable of it in every way. That its silence and its eloquence are alike of Him. Its wisdom, and the absence of all that is not simple or what might be called science. That it is silent as to the contrast, and yet distinguishes creation and formation in a way no man ever in fact was capable of, shewing an account coming from Divine knowledge, and yet fitted to human ignorance in its most childhood days, yet giving all morally important and elevating for any of us, testing our faith in some things, and proving itself divine for the faith that is to be tried. I am satisfied none but God could have given such an account, though I could not have so judged if I had not had it, and the essayists could not have commented on it as they have done if they had not had it. What conclusions would have been drawn from the discoveries of geology, if Christianity had not come. What a comfort it is to know one has God's own word, the communication of His thoughts and mind in the interest He takes in us.

H. In truth it is—I am glad you are satisfied.

W. Satisfied, yet ignorant of many things ; but the tone and spirit of these essayists are sufficient, it seems to me, to prove that they have no sense of the divine, and even the historical comparison we have made, brief as it has been, of human thoughts and divine revelation, is sufficient to stamp its true character on the latter.

H. Well, I suppose we must part for the present. If spared, we may perhaps take up some other point of the essays, though some from their occasional nature hardly merit any notice.

A Dialogue on the Second of the Essays and Reviews.

H. Shall we take up the review of “Bunsen’s Biblical Researches” to-day? It has specially as its object the spreading the German system of discrediting the Scriptures, as we possess them. It is evident that the mass of readers cannot enter into arguments founded on linguistic or even historic criticism. And if the Scriptures have not authority as the Word of God, substantially as they are, that authority is gone, and with it every direct communication from God. If Scripture be not this, certainly nothing else is; and mankind are deprived of all direct communication from Him. The immense bearing of this is self-evident. The great question is, not whether there are defects through lapse of ages and man’s want of care in the record of Divine communications—defects which every possible research may be used to remedy,—but, first, whether there are such communications, and, next, whether there be a divinely-given record of them. It is freely admitted that it is through man, and in a large portion of it the history of man just as he was, with a measure of Divine light, or without it, in special if imperfect relationships, or with the Divine light come down traditionally from those in more direct communication: in a word, that Scripture gives us the whole working of Divine light in all its phases and its effects, and the workings of man's mind under it. It is admitted that the very object of a large part of it is to show the results in man put thus to the test in various ways, that man may know himself; and that this is accompanied by the patience of a condescending God working in the midst of this. All this is admitted—yea, insisted on. The question is not there. The question is, Are the Scriptures a Divine record of Divine communications, in which God has unfolded all this before us, and given us, besides, His own mind and thoughts as to it, and the ground of our relationship with Him? If this be the case, then the Scriptures are wholly and absolutely in contrast with every other book. Other books are not a divinely-given record of God's thoughts; the Scriptures are. They have taken up humanity in all its forms, and held it up such as it is in the light, and under the eye of God, and given us that light, so that the darkness is past and the true light now shineth. We may have aspirations after God, the working of conscience, thoughts of need, giving much more real sense of what God must be to help us than the pride of intellectual reasoning. But the revelation of God is the full answer to all this; and that no man can give. God has in Scripture given us the helpful description of these workings, so that the answer may be better understood. He has brought out in historical realities and moral searchings of heart, without law, and under law, these wants and cravings, and the display of man's incompetency to meet God. We have the struggles of a Job, and the heart exercises of the Psalms, the experience of all under the sun in the Preacher—man left to himself before the flood, man on the ground of obedience to law, man in obedient royalty in Israel, and man in unfettered supremacy in Babylon. The results of all this are given, and in Christ, the last Adam, God is fully revealed, and is (dying withal that it may be righteous) the way to God. This is not a speculation of what God may be. It is a revelation of what He is and the way to Him. If Christianity be true, it is this: When, in the wisdom of God, the world by wisdom knew not God, it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe. It is not the speculations of man's mind, but Christ crucified; to the Jews a stumbling-block, to the Greeks foolishness; but to us that are saved Christ, the power of God, and the wisdom of God. God has made foolish the wisdom of this world. He has chosen the foolish things to confound the wise, and weak things and things that are not to bring to nought things that are. Such was the Divine system, and such it is. If Christianity be true at all, it is the express opposite of all the system advocated by these Essays.

W. Of that I am fully convinced. I see plainly that the very essence of Christianity as a revelation is the bringing Divine light into the course of this world and of the human heart;—is to show, not indeed that there are no amiable natural qualities, for there are, but that, with them or without them, man is alienated from God, that in his flesh dwells no good thing. I see plainly, too, that man's moral estimate of good must be lowered, if he does not so judge. But with this he has a perfect revelation of love, and of a righteous way for man through the cross into the perfect enjoyment of it. But the difficulties are to be met. I feel I am in the evening darkness when I take up this book, with all its pretensions; but it is difficult to catch a flitting bat who is in his element when he is there.

H. The main thing, I apprehend, in these cases is to bring in the light. Bats are gone when it comes, and crouch into more natural darkness. What they have of Christianity has given them this twilight—a perplexing kind of light; their home is darkness. I speak, of course, of the principles, not of the men. There may be first last and last first.

Scripture calls God light, and it calls Him love, which are the titles you have used in speaking of Him. He is that. He is not holiness, for that is relative; He is not righteousness, though He be holy and righteous. To be holy, there must be knowledge of good and evil; and so of righteousness; but that, i.e., evil, cannot be within God; but perfect purity, and that which manifests all, He is; and the perfect activity of goodness, that is, love; and so Scripture speaks. And this makes the cross so glorious, of which you speak as the way. God meets sin there. Oh, what a wondrous meeting! yet in perfect love, but in perfect righteousness and holiness; yea, exalting them by it. Hence he says, Now is the Son of Man glorified—for it was glorious for a man to do it—and God is glorified in him. If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in Himself, and shall straightway glorify him—shall not wait for the outward display in the coming kingdom, but shall glorify him in Himself, who was glorified in Him. This is man's place in hope and in spiritual nature and affections now; hence not of the world, as Christ, who came from heaven and as a Divine person was in heaven, was not of the world. This nature may display itself in a thousand exercises and relationships here, as it did in Christ, and in us—mixed with failures, alas! for which there is provision in Him; but the proper association of our nature and standing as Christians is with Him in heaven. Hence he says, Jesus knowing that the Father had given all things into His hand, and that He came from God and went to God, in presence of all He was and was going to, and in presence of treachery and failure, takes the place of a servant to wash His disciples' feet, that they might have a part with him. He could not stay with them in this polluted earth. Hence, too, when Peter would have other than his feet washed—his need through defilement from daily walk, the Lord says: He that is washed, really partakes of this Divine nature (for they were, save Judas, clean through the word spoken), needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit. What a picture of grace! what a witness of our portion or part with Him! and while giving the assurance that the truth of the Divine nature is there (for here He speaks of water, not of blood), to give us morally elevating confidence in intercourse with God, and yet allow of not the smallest daily stain, yet learn grace in it.

W. It is a picture at once most lovely and elevated of the Lord's grace.

H. If you examine it closely, you will see that it comes after His earthly claims are witnessed and closed. As Son of God, He raises Lazarus; as Son of David, He rides into Jerusalem. When the Greeks come up, he says: The hour is come that the Son of Man should be glorified; but then adds, He must fall into the ground as a corn of wheat and die. In the 13th chapter, He shows how we have part with Him when He could not with us. But note this well. If we are to be really elevated, it is taking us in spirit out of this world. He gave Himself for our sins, to deliver us from this present world. However, we will turn from Scripture to Dr. Williams and Baron Bunsen, if you are so disposed.

W. If you please. I should gladly pursue our inquiry into the whole of John's Gospel; but I suppose, for the moment, we must pursue our subject.

H. Note, then, the principles Dr. Williams lays down. "There is hardly any greater question than whether history shows Almighty God to have trained mankind by a faith which has reason and conscience for its kindred, or by one to whose miraculous tests their pride must bow." I deny the alternative altogether. But what shall we say to his account of English scholars at the Universities? "They stand balancing terror against mutual shame. Even with those in our Universities who no longer repeat fully the required Shibboleths, the explicitness of truth is rare. He who assents most, committing himself least to baseness, is reckoned wisest." What a picture!

W. It is no great compliment. Their faith has not reason and conscience for its kindred, at any rate, whatever kind of tests they may have to bow to.

H. It is just the effect of narrowness such as theology without Scripture gives, tied up by system, and turning in its will to unlawful fields of delight; sober research is not followed out, and as liberty cannot be had, pretensions to it, which are really infidelity, must be had resort to to seem free. But though such a position be sufficiently despicable, and we have not assigned it to them, nor do I see any good in discrediting thus morally the educational and religious heads of the country (I should at any rate leave it to themselves to do so); yet the evil is deeper. It is reducing Christianity to man, not raising man by Christianity. "Devotion raises time present into the sacredness of the past;" that is, what we have now of spiritual power is pretty much equivalent to the apostolic energy; "and criticism reduces the strangeness of the past into harmony with the present;" that is, the times of Christ and His works were no more than what we have now. Heathenism must itself be on the same level. We are not to "acknowledge a Providence in Jewry without owning that it may have comprehended sanctities elsewhere." Not a very lucid statement, but which means that, if the Jewish religion were something more, yet heathenism was as much owned of God: "Its religions appealed to the better side of our nature, and their essential strength lay in the good they contained." So Bunsen "traces frankly the Spirit of God elsewhere, but honouring chiefly the traditions of His Hebrew sanctuary." Nor will they hear of anything superior to man. "Our author then believes St. Paul, because he understands him reasonably." Now, it is difficult to follow the statements of the paper of Baron Bunsen, because, with an immense store of reading, Bunsen, evidently personally a most amiable and attractive person, skimmed everything more than he thoroughly searched anything; sought to reduce all events to their most abstract ideality, which was its only truth for him (and it is in this last point its fallacy and infidel character consisted), and indulged an imagination amiable by its very wantonness. You see a man who can believe anything, if he thought it, and mean no harm; but put that as truth, while research after certainty was too prosaic for him. Endless supposition and ideality; truth not necessary to the structure of his mind. He has read and studied a vast deal, thought a great deal, written a great deal, to show what might be or must have been; the prose of what was does not seem to have occurred to him as a subject of inquiry. He felt, like our essayists, the narrowness of conventional Oxford-like education and system, and sought in emancipating himself and being suggestive, as our essayists say, liberty, not truth. A balloon is free, but as yet no one has known how to guide it. In his history, "giant shapes of ancient empires flit like dim shadows, evoked by a master's hand." The only misfortune is, they are only shadows—they never existed. Then some 20,000 years are needed for them. There must have been to form the empires, and the language too; but the empires were only shadows, and the 20,000 years flit away necessarily like the empires. None of the allegations bear serious examination. Next, the whole system is founded on believing in the goodness of man. He believes, as the reviewer says, in Christ, because he believes in God and in mankind. There you have the real truth. What is believing in mankind? That they are sinners, lost? So Christianity undoubtedly teaches. So the reviewer speaks of God's giving us, through His Son, a deeper revelation of His own presence. Present He always was in man, only this was somewhat fuller, and "the incarnation becomes as purely spiritual as it was with Paul." All truth disappears under Baron Bunsen's musings. Ideas remain. Nought else. Christ is an idea. This levelling of all facts to exalt man by ideas is followed out by the reviewer. "First, as regards the subject-matter, both spiritual affection and metaphysical reasoning forbid us to confine revelations like those of Christ to the first half century of our era, but show at least affinities of our faith existing in men's minds anterior to Christianity, and renewed with deep echo from living hearts in many a generation." . . . "We find the evidences of our canonical books, and of the patristic authors nearest to them, are sufficient to form illustration in outward act of principles perpetually true; but not adequate to guarantee narratives inherently incredible, or precepts evidently wrong." We will speak of this hereafter. But the first thing, in this chaos of words and abstract principles, which it is important for our minds to dwell on is, what Christianity professes to be. I say, professes to be. My business now is not to prove it true, but to show that the idea to which it is reduced here is false, and impossible if it be true. The reader must remember that the reviewers profess to be Christians—to be Christian teachers—and to be teachers of those intended to be teachers. They cannot say we deny Christianity. They are only wiser Christians; they would suit Christianity to human nature—to men, to man's progress. They would not have the narrowness of ancient orthodoxy, and they abhor evangelical truth; but they must be Christians, or leave the position they hold. The explicitness of truth, they tell us, is rare. Now Christianity is very explicit. It does not speak of revelations of Christ—that is, thoughts communicated by Him—but found in living hearts in many a generation. It declares that the Father sent His Son to be the Saviour of the world. It is a religion of facts, and so suited to the poor. Half the population of England would not understand the sentence I have quoted above. The Gospel may, alas! be rejected, but it consists in facts suited to every man's heart and conscience. Christianity states deep things, which, if received, reveal God in a way that makes Him possess the heart; but it states them simply, because what is perfectly known can be simply stated, and God knows perfectly what He reveals in grace.

But to return to the point I insist on. Christianity is a religion of immense facts; facts which contain unspeakably important principles, but facts which connect those principles with God, are a revelation of Him, and not with man's thinkings or aspirations. Thus "the Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, (and we beheld His glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father,) full of grace and truth. For the law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." "I," says Jesus, "came forth from the Father, and came into the world; and again, I leave the world, and go to the Father." Now principles are here: law contrasted with grace and truth; but the former in the facts which happened at Sinai; the latter in the fact that the Son of God is come from heaven into this world. And the essence and substance of Christianity was to believe that this Person was the Christ, was the Son of God—was to believe these facts which He asserted of Himself, or His Apostles after Him declared to be so, alleging that they worked miracles to aid men to believe. Christ declares that if men did not believe Him they would die in their sins; that he that believed on the Son had everlasting life; that he that believed not was condemned already. He declares that nobody had ascended up to heaven so as to tell of heavenly things, but He that came down from heaven; but that He spoke that He knew, and testified that He had seen. Paul, too, for whom incarnation was so spiritual, sees that just One returned into glory, and hears the voice of His mouth, that he might be, as he insists he was, an eye-witness that in very deed He, who thought it no robbery to be equal with God, had made Himself of no reputation, and taken on Him the form of a servant, and was found in fashion as a man; and though his ministry was mainly to show man righteously exalted to heaven, John's, God come down in grace to the earth; still, the same great facts are distinctly declared by him as by all. Stephen declares the wondrous fact, which, in the order of revelation, led the way on to Paul's ministry, that he saw the Son of Man standing at the right hand of God.

If we take other facts constituting the bases of Christianity—the Incarnation; it lies at the outset and foundation of its history that Christ was not born as men are born, but conceived of the Holy Ghost. That a holy thing was born of Mary, through this miraculous interposition. This fact gives us a sinless man born of God—a son of man, indeed, but a second man, a last Adam. An immense fact, involving an immense principle, completely brought into light by the rejection and death of this blessed one (for man, with all his analogous revelations out of living hearts, would none of a living Saviour; He was by wicked hands crucified and slain): the principle that man was a hopeless sinner, and a new man to be set up. But then comes another fact. He rises; the power of death is destroyed. I do not know what affinity, or deep echo, there is of resurrection in men's minds. I have not heard it. It has not reached the world of history. In what dell has Dr. Williams been where its echo has sounded concealed from all? The sound of resurrection once reached the ears of instructed men, but what echo did it bring back? When they heard of the resurrection of the dead, some mocked; some, happily startled at the strange sound which spoke relief to dying man, said, "We will hear thee again of this matter." Death, ah! its echo has sounded far and wide. Yea, it needs none. It speaks in its own voice on the right hand and the left. It says, Who can escape me? who can tell what has brought me? who shall return out of my hand again? Is Paul wrong who tells that sin brought my terror-striking power on man? Who can tell where I bring those on whom I lay my hand? Is it to judgment? Where is it? Who has returned to tell the tale? What affinities shall help me here? What living hearts tell me more than I know? They fear or hope like me. Death makes them as serious as it makes me. If Christ be my God, it is a gain, the brightest moment of life; it is to depart and be with Him. But if not, who of these fancied revealers has ever revealed what is beyond? Hope. Yes, since Christianity, infidels can. But resurrection goes farther; it destroys death's power wholly. What came in by the first Adam is destroyed by the second, and brings into glory. The resurrection is an immense fact; glorious truths and principles in it. The power of Divine life paramount to death. Acceptance of man in a wholly new state, reasoned on largely by the Apostles, especially Paul. Still a simple but immense fact. That God should become a man; that the Son should be personally revealed as man on earth; that He should die as man on the cross; that He should triumph over death, and rise again, and ascend as man in a spiritual and glorified body into heaven, assuring to those who believed on Him that they would be with and like Him; these are facts—if Christianity be true at all—which make it simple nonsense to talk of “affinities of our faith existing in men’s minds anterior to Christianity, and renewed with deep echo from living hearts in many a generation.” No doubt aspirations there were before in men’s hearts, through the moral desolation of the world. Prophecies too, before Christ, which, in a chosen and called people, kept alive the hope of something better; and every Christian of course believes that these facts, and the principles of grace and truth they involve, are received in many living hearts since, with more or less depth of feeling and find an echo there. But the prophecies were not the thing prophesied of, the aspirations were not the Divine answer that met and more than met them. Nor is the blessed echo in the believer’s heart, he well knows, the fact that has awakened it—that heavenly sound which it echoes with joy in its praises. There is realization of it all, living realization, affinity, because the believer is partaker of the Divine nature. If God be love, the believer loves. If God be holy, the believer is made partaker of His holiness. Is Christ glorified? the believer will be like Him, and seeks to be spiritually like Him now. But the person of Christ, His death, His resurrection, remain great and unchangeable facts. He does not speak of revelations of Christ (i. e., by Him), and affinities in other men’s minds, but he knows that the Son of God is come; he knows that the Father sent the Son; that Christ is a person come down from heaven, so that He could reveal what is there (not merely aspire after it); that He loved us and gave Himself for us, appears in the presence of God for us; that we have forgiveness of sins through Him, salvation in no other; and that if He was God upon earth, the Word made flesh, He is Man in heaven. There can be no affinities to facts in men's minds; there may be effects produced by them, which bring the mind into suited feelings; there may be dark aspirations after what is better. But a revelation, and the Son of God coming into the world to create the one and to meet the other are another thing. The statement of Dr. Williams is a covert denial of Christianity. It reduces it to thoughts and feelings in men's minds not confined to the revelations of Christ, and here Dr. Williams is even further from Christianity than Bunsen. Now Christ did reveal most blessed grace and truth. But Christianity rests on what He was, what He suffered, and on His resurrection. If that be not true, our faith is vain, we are yet in our sins, and, as the Apostle confesses, if it be not, they were false witnesses of God. He had seen the Lord after His resurrection, and he could appeal, not only to the Apostles, but to hundreds, as eye-witnesses of the fact. The Apostles were to be witnesses of His resurrection, of this immense fact. What affinity is there to that? No; however covertly it may be done—however Christ's revelations may be spoken of, and moral beauty be sought elsewhere as well—the putting Christianity on this ground is the denial of it; for if Christianity consist in the great facts I have referred to, there is, and can be, no affinity to it as such. Affinity to resurrection is nonsense, if resurrection be related as a fact on which moral truth is based. How wise is God. My thoughts are not God personally incarnate. My being dead to sin and alive to God is not the Son of God passing through death actually and rising again that I may be so. Let any one admit the facts, that is, that Christianity is true, and the views here given by Dr. Williams are at once seen to be the denial of it, because what passes in men's minds are not such facts. If Christianity be only what the affinities of men's minds are, Christianity, as a revelation, is not true. If there be affinities to Christianity, then the Christianity of the Bible and of the universal Church is false, for one states, and the other has believed it as a religion of Divine facts, however much they have disputed about doctrines. And no honest man can read the Scriptures without seeing that the men who relate and reason on Christianity, the original promulgators of it to the world, rest all on these facts, declare themselves often eye-witnesses of many of them, and rest Christianity on their truth. It is impossible to read the New Testament, the references to the origin of Christianity in fathers, heretics, enemies, or pagans, and not see that it rested on a series of facts alleged to be supernatural and Divine, which Christians believed, and their adversaries, save as to the fact of the cross, denied. The miracles they did not deny, but accounted for. With these facts the affinities of men's minds have nothing to do. He who makes Christianity to consist in them denies Christianity altogether as a religion of God. If it be not, is there any such? If none, where are we? where are we going? If we take the character of the revelation of these facts, the contrast is equally great. He that hath received His testimony hath set to his seal that God is true. Not that what is said is truth merely: he has owned God to be true, as He has spoken. For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God. John, who spoke as a prophet, yet says, "He that is of the earth is earthy, but He that cometh from above is above all, and what He hath seen and heard that He testifieth, and no man receiveth His testimony." So Christ himself (John viii. 47), "He that is of God heareth God's words." Read the whole chapter, and see where are the affinities of living hearts. Again, "He was that eternal life which was with the Father and manifested to us." The whole of the New Testament presents the testimony of Christ as a directly Divine testimony; not the thoughts or aspirations of the human heart, but God's words, the words of one who could tell what was in heaven, if man was darkly aspiring after it, because He came down from heaven, and spoke what He had seen, heard, and known there. In a different way the Holy Ghost has done the same in the Apostles. It was not what passed in man's mind, but a clear revelation from God, because man's mind could not find out the truth and God, as history plainly proves. The world by wisdom knew not God, and it pleased God, by the foolishness of preaching, to save them that believe. It presents itself in this form in contrast with, and as exactly the contrary of, what Dr. Williams says. If it be not such, it is false, and a horrible imposture, and yet a holy imposture, which there is nothing like in the world, to reveal all that is in man and all that is in God. Let any one produce anything at all like it. Take away this, and what have you as a revelation? What have heathens given us at best?—a despairing recognition that if man was to have any moral deliverance it must be thus. The highest heathen philosophy held it impossible that the Supreme God could have directly to say to a creature or to the creation. The fact of Christianity is that He Himself became a man. God is not afraid to compromise His name. He is God everywhere—nowhere more so than when He is a man, for He is perfect love.

W. It is quite evident that Christianity and the whole system are in essential and total opposition. If the ideas of Dr. Williams are true, Christianity is false; and yet there is nought that approaches to it in excellence, nihil simile aut secundum. If Dr. Williams's views are false, they are high treason against the goodness of God. That is plain enough.

H. Remark another thing—their moral incapacity to seize the bearing of their own or their adversaries' views. There is a conscience, a sense of good and evil, without a revelation. More of that anon. But Christianity, as a revelation of God, gives us entire confidence in goodness, but an object out of self, delight in goodness out of ourselves, faith in that which is revealed in another. The infidel party bring us back to self, to confidence in self, value for self. Man is as good in other ways as what has been had in Christ; at any rate, it is a question of degree. All is man; that is, Christianity takes out of self, by a divinely perfect object. Infidelity exalts self, lives in what is really degradation. What is exalted in this system? What is exalted in Christianity? I spoke once to an intelligent artizan nurtured in this doctrine, of the beauty and perfectness of Christ. "Oh," he replied, "you will never see me do anything unworthy of a man." What man? Himself to be sure. At the cost of his own humiliation the Christian admits the Divine excellency which condemns him. These unhappy men, as we can again find here, in order to reduce all to a dead level, lower, or rather see nothing Divine in Christianity; and then, what really is disgraceful morally, as we have seen in Dr. Temple, and see again here, put heathenism on a level with it, or as nearly as they dare. I confess this seems to me a villifying themselves beyond all belief. But so they do. It is the direct point of the paper we are considering. "Devotion," it is said, "raises time present (i. e., ourselves) into the sacredness of the past; while criticism reduces the strangeness of the past into harmony with the present." What past? Why revelation. That is what is criticised. That is, the object is to reduce what is Divine, or presents itself definitely and absolutely as such, as the "words of God," and "works of the Father," to the level of what men say and do now, and give sacredness and importance to ourselves by saying we are as Divine as what is revealed to us. Remove God Himself, whom Christianity has revealed, far away—lower what is Divine, and exalt self—that is the avowed object of Dr. Williams.

W. Well, it really cannot be denied. It is but spargere voces in vulgum ambiguas at present, but the interpretation you give does but put it in plain language, and it condemns itself.

H. Plain language they cannot boast of. I read, "we cannot acknowledge a Providence in Jewry without owning that it may have comprehended sanctities elsewhere." Now that God's providence acted sovereignly everywhere, that the confinement of specific relationship to Israel was only because historically men had everywhere departed from God, every Christian owns, and the Book of Job is the special witness of it. It is asserted in a thousand places by prophets, and in Psalms. Jonas is the public witness of its subsistence when Israel was fully formed as a people. But what is the meaning of this precious phrase, "Providence comprehending sanctities elsewhere"? If we are to be permitted to take a meaning out of it, as our Irish fellow-countrymen say, it is simply that the heathen were as holy as God's people, and as really in direct relationship with Him. If so, of course the Old Testament, and Christ's statements, and the Apostles, and the whole scheme of Scripture, is totally false. These do teach us that Christianity has broken down the middle wall of partition, but that before God had not had His name called on any other people, but had chosen Israel for Himself out of all nations. The whole scheme of Scripture is on this showing false; salvation was not of the Jews, as the Lord asserts. The passage which follows, however, justifies the interpretation I have given to Dr. Williams's oracle. He adds, "But the moment we examine fairly the religions of India and Arabia, or even of primæval Hellas and Latium, we find they appealed to the better side of our nature, and their essential strength lay in the elements of good which they contained, rather than in any Satanic corruption." So thought not Paul: but let that pass. Dr. Williams has, of course, keener spiritual perception than he. He was in conflict with the evil, saw it around him, would feel its evil and corruption, and could not take so philosophic and cool a view of it as Dr. Williams now. Indeed, it would have sadly cooled his zeal; his idea of revelation would have widened and deepened. Jupiter, whose ways appealed to the better side of our nature, would have had a part in his sympathies. You may have remarked what is said in the essay on national churches. I will recall to you a specimen of this moral levelling :—

“It was natural for a Christian, in the earliest period, to look upon the heathen state in which he found himself as if it belonged to the kingdom of Satan, and not to that of God ; and consecrated as it was, in all its offices, to the heathen divinities, to consider it a society having its origin from the powers of darkness, not from the Lord of light and life.” . . . . “But the primitive Christians could scarcely be expected to see that ultimately the Gospel was to have sway in doing more perfectly that which the heathen religions were doing imperfectly ; that its office should be, not only to quicken the spirit of the individual and to confirm his future hopes, but to sanctify all social relations and civil institutions, and to enter into the marrow of the national life ; whereas heathenism had only decorated the surface of it. Heathendom had its national churches ; indeed the existence of a national church is not only a permissible thing, but is necessary to the completion of a national life, and has shown itself in all nations when they have made any advance in civilization.” (p. 168.)

Paul could bend himself, however, to human condition and human infirmity in a wonderful way, to seek a point where he could meet those he dealt with, and at Athens meet a weary and wandering conscience with an unknown God ; and bring the true one to ignorant and more savage Lystrians, as not having left Himself without witness in that He did good, and gave rain and fruitful seasons, and filled men’s hearts with food and gladness. He could lead people to the true God by this, but he could not justify corruption and devils like Dr. Williams, nor call evil good, and good evil, and put darkness for light, and light for darkness. The true picture of it he gives Rom. i. There is reason, as Dr. Williams alleges, and conscience, and I see Paul meeting with the utmost earnestness of love, and the delicacy of tact which love gives, the point in man’s state accessible to it, in order to draw him to the goodness and holy grace of the true God, out of the evil he was in ; but never seeking, as Dr. Williams, to widen the idea of revelation, and lower it to the level of the heathenism it was to draw men out of, and thus make them content with their degradation. When Christianity sunk morally, Porphyrys and Iamblichus, sought to do this by refining on heathenism, and making myths of it, as Julian sought in vain to moralize it to make a stand against Christianity, which, by its fruits, told on the conscience; but never did an Apostle, or any one who had a sense of the excellency of Christ. Paul can quote their own poets, can use all means to win all, but never to sanctify evil, and so degrade the moral judgment of man. This was reserved for the pretenders to higher moral discernment of the nineteenth century. But a word more on this. We have already spoken on this sanction of heathenism. It is characteristic of the system: this moral levelling all excellency to make an unwholesome swamp of man's mind, where all stagnates and never rises above its own level. But some particular features of it occur in this paper. It is called widening revelation and deepening it. Widening means giving it so large a meaning that that should be considered a revelation which is no revelation at all. Man's mind works; thoughts are produced. How that is deepening revelation I confess I do not know. I suppose they think men's thoughts are deeper than God's. Less simple they are. All is seen in obscurity, and thought to be profound. But where are they—these revelations? Is Jupiter a revelation, or Brahm and Siva? I deny all revelation save what revelation means, God's communications to man. Let it be produced. I do not deny shreds of the knowledge of God, but I deny revelation. There is conscience in all, and conscience of God; and there is reason; and there was a knowledge of God from His original revelations of Himself, which men had not discernment to retain, and there was the evidence of Nature. This conscience could not be got rid of, nor reason, however fearfully perverted, nor the consciousness of superior power. But this was corrupted. This side of human nature is found in heathenism, as the Apostle largely declares; but heathenism itself is a vast system of diabolical corruption and sanctifying of lusts, which was obliged to let this in, for Satan can only act in and by what was in man; and conscience and the sense of superior power was in man. But the heathenism was the exclusion of God in unity as far as possible, and the deifying of lusts and powers of Nature. It was only the connecting of man, such as man was in sin, with devils; a departure from God without being able to destroy the idea of one, or the conscience which God had taken care should accompany sin; but it in no way sought to maintain the one or to meet the other, but to exclude the one and deaden and pervert the other. It took the character of each distinct nation. In Greece it was gay, poetic, and corrupt; in India, a wonderful apprehension of the powers of Nature, with a tinge of kindness interspersed; in Egypt, wisdom, and sobriety of judgment as to man; in Canaan, the filth of inveterate corruption: but in all, without exception, sanctified corruption. In the north, perhaps, the wilder and more warlike passions, but in all passion. It was the devil's revelation of a lie, if it was a revelation, unless Siva, and Jupiter, and Khem be truths. It seized existing facts, but only made a lie of them. There is no 'repressive idea of revelation', as regards conscience or reason. There is an authoritative revelation of facts, and teaching of truths by God, which act on conscience and give reason its best light. Reason judges probably, but never more, of the truth and falsehood of anything as a consequence. A revelation gives certain truth, or it is not one. If it be truth, conscience, liable to be misled, is rightly led by it. Reason, as to the direct reception of a revelation, is out of court, because reason draws conclusions, and a revelation is received as a testimony. To say that reason and conscience are absolute judges, or competent to be so, is palpably and historically false. Reason and conscience received Brahmanism and Buddhism, and Ionism, and the Egyptian system, and Odin King of Men, and Druidism—all false and different in form.—Did they judge rightly in this? If not, are they not at least incompetent to hold the balance, and rule above the will and corrupt influences? Why am I to trust them in judging of what is infinite in excellence? They could not secure man's judgment in the grossest cases imaginable of superstition and moral vileness. I admit conscience, when acted on, recognizes holy truth and Divine authority. But when it begins to judge, not good and evil in itself, but to determine the will as competent to judge for itself, as reasoning, it has ceased to be conscience, or rather conscience has ceased to act, and influences and motives are in play. Conscience knows murder, fruit of hatred, is wrong; that stealing is wrong, disobedience to parents wrong. Did a religion come saying "that is good," as such, conscience could say, "that cannot be from God, for it is not good: that is a lie, not the truth." But if, not conscience, but pride, begin to say, "God ought not to have done this; miracles do not suit man's better knowledge," I reply, "Ah! my poor conscience, you are putting on these peacocks' feathers, are you? You are too late. Why did not you judge all the juggling of oracles, false gods, and priestcraft these four or five thousand years? This is all very fine. Christianity has saved you from all this long-lasting shame, from which you never could save yourself, and never did, with all your fine pretensions now; and you now turn to set up to be competent to judge about what it ought to have been, and reject the very pretensions the power of which alone gave you any sense to judge at all. No, no; keep in your place, according to the light which you have got back to. In your own measure call good good and evil evil. That you have only learnt really to do through Christianity. Let us see how lively you will be as to this under its influence, and we will applaud you. And do not speak to us, at least by the mouth of those who tell us 'they stand balancing terror against mutual shame.' The eye, though capable of seeing, wants light; but do not fancy because you are the mind's moral eye, that you are therefore God, to know how in His workings and ways

He ought to behave. Why did you not judge what man had to do when he was under your care? What did you make of him? Let history tell. If God has graciously used miracles, not against conscience, but to arouse it, and help man against influences tending to incredulity, and to show that there was a power in God above the evil to which you, conscience, had succumbed, do not you complain or set up to judge God for a deliverance which, without this, you never did effect. Do not say it could be done without it. You can tell that you say. Why did you not then do it in the four thousand years—twenty thousand if you please—which had elapsed? Your pretended competency to judge of means, and reliance on your own power in behalf of man, is an historically proved falsehood. You let man sink into the grossest superstition and corruptions. The Christianity you are calling in question delivered him somehow or another; that is a fact (deep as, conscience and reason and all, he is fallen again in corrupt Christianity and rationalism), you never could." I do not talk of 'kindred reason and conscience'. I admit both, and revelation speaks to both; but I say that it is an historical fact that with them man fell from the light he had into the pit of degradation. Christianity delivered him, and set reason and conscience in the light, and on their right ground, and nothing else did. I am talking of history. I trust my reason, for things of reason, as far as it is reasonable; that is, as to what is subjected to it. I have to act according to my conscience when this is in the light; indeed it is honest to do so when imperfectly enlightened; but trust to man's pretended competency to judge of revelation by them and of what a religion ought to be, I cannot, because with them man has received everything as true that is false, base, and wicked to be God, and that is corrupt and abominable to be a duty, until God came in power to deliver, and has rejected what was excellent and holy. I have got my senses, now I am in the light, to see that with my senses I fell into the ditch when I had not the light.

and that all the eyes in the world could not make a ray of light, though now I have the light I know it is light. And I have no inclination now I have it to put it out, or to say that eyes without it were competent to see, kindred to light; and widen the sense of light, to make it comprehend men walking, and walking in darkness, and their feeling their way an almost equivalent to having the light—a deepening of the idea of what light is.

W. I feel that your estimate is just. I must get rid of history and facts, as well as every moral sentiment of my nature, to receive the theories of these men. Yet they use the name of Christ, while setting conscience above revelation.

H. Of their speaking of Christ anon, but conscience being above revelation is nonsense upon the face of it. A man may deny revelation; that I understand. I reject his thought as a horror, a moral impossibility, that man should be so left; but it is not nonsense. But if there be a revelation really, that is God. Conscience is man; and a conscience above revelation is man above God.

W. But must not I judge of a revelation?

H. It is not the common way of receiving it, because it acts with Divine light on the conscience. I cannot say the eye judges light—light makes the eye see. A revelation being holy, convicts of sin, and so proves itself. But when we have to judge of a revelation, if it be one, I am judged by my judgment. If I judge a beautiful picture to be a bad one, and that the painters ought to have distributed the lights so and so, what is judged when one knows what really is beautiful? Why I am. Our judgment proves what we are. There is no escaping that, unless finally man is to judge God, not God man. Oh, what a judgment it would be! Yet that is really the question, and in truth we have seen it brought to a trial and issue in Christ. Golgotha can tell that tale. Our reception or non-reception of the truth is our judgment, and so the New Testament declares. Both analogy and history give us to understand this important principle, wholly overlooked by these unbelieving reasoners, that for the use of a faculty, power outside itself may be needed, so that when the power is not there the faculty is useless. When it is there, it acts rightly and freely; but its action is wholly dependent on a power independent of it. It exists without the power, but cannot act without it. Conscience is a faculty of the soul, as the power of seeing is of the eye; but conscience without revelation, without light from God, has never judged rightly: Man with this faculty has received all the devilish horrors and corruption it is possible to imagine; he walks in darkness, and knows not at what he stumbles. But light is independent of the eye, and the eye judges not light, but everything by the light. Conscience judges not revelation but by revelation, or perfect Divine light, that is, Christ Himself. God is light, and Christ is that light in the world. If men have had it elsewhere, let them say where.

W. It is clear. After all, it is only saying there is a God, and that as such He must be above man's judgment and the power of it. It is all confusion to speak of revelation being contrary to conscience, or having reason and conscience for its kindred. God, and God revealing Himself, has His place; and if God does not reveal Himself, we are godless creatures—not without a sense that there is a God, but ignorant of what He is; in the deplorable condition of knowing there is a God, and not knowing Him; with conscience enough to know we are in evil, but ignorant how to get out of it. History, the complaints of a Socrates, the puny efforts of others, show and tell—the world by wisdom knew not God.

H. Surely, surely; and the sense of excellency gives the sense of wretchedness; of excellency—blessed be His name—in God; of wretchedness in man; but then of infinite love towards us. If the world by wisdom knew God, it did not know love; if it did, where is the knowledge to be found? I defy Dr. Williams, conscience, and reason, and all, to tell me. If God does reveal Himself, He reveals Himself as God. Man is not a judge of the way. He has received every kind of lie as God, then laughed at it in the end, in the mockery of despair, without finding out it was his wretched self he was laughing at. But this revelation does not exclude but awake conscience, makes it for the first time see good, which it in this light can recognize. For God who is light, is goodness or love manifested in the midst of men. Conscience is not the instrumentality of revelation, as they say. Such a statement is nonsense. A revelation is God's making something known which was not otherwise apprehended, perhaps could not have been. Conscience is no instrumentality in revealing. It is a positive essential faculty in man, knowing or discerning good and evil: but that is not an instrument of revelation. It is a proper independent faculty, which the believer knows to have been acquired in the fall. But it must have its object before it, to say it is good or evil; that is, it has nothing to do with revealing. Its object must be there and then; when not perverted, it says, if good be before it, that is good; if evil, that is evil; Reason discerns cause and effect, and as reasoning draws consequences; in moral things runs closely into conscience. But it is never an instrument of revelation, unless in the sense that the Holy Spirit uses a man as an instrument in revealing; but in itself never is. It must have its object to reason about. Revelation gives objects otherwise unknown, or fresh truth about known objects, or it is not a revelation. This neither conscience nor reason do in their very nature. I may figuratively say: It really was a revelation—that is, the perception of reason was so quick, that it was, in comparison with other minds, like one. But this only proves the difference I have stated. In a word, conscience and reason must have objects to judge of. A revelation communicates objects which men have not. There is no contrast with revelation; they are no parts of its instrumentality. Reason and conscience have their own proper power in their place, needing, in order to act in Divine things, a light wholly independent of them, that is, a revelation. In their place they are like every other faculty, and, as the most important ones, blessed. As I have said, when conscience has got light, it can say, Jupiter and Saturn cannot be gods; and reason can say, when it has got the idea of God, there cannot be two. Reason can never say is, or is not, but must and cannot. Ideas, and not facts, are its sphere. Revelation says is—another most important difference. I believe the idea of God is, in spite of Locke, at the bottom of every heart: corrupted and dimmed, but in every heart; and so, of course, are conscience and reason, though blind and corrupted, till light comes, and through passions, interests, and Satanic power, losing the light and being blinded when men have had it. They did not discern to retain God in their knowledge. I have been, I am conscious, long in my lucubrations on this subject, but hope I have not lost your attention. Those who have followed the phases of the new school, and particularly abroad in its French forms (for it uses, but is not the old rationalism), know that their battle-horse is this point of conscience. All their statements are, however, error and confusion, and, like everything they say, as superficial as it is pretentious.

W. I have listened diligently to what you have been saying. It has not, of course, the interest which unfolding the range of Scripture, or touching on its main beauties, has; but I see plainly the need of getting clear hold of the true place of conscience and reason, insisted on as they are by them; and it has deep interest as general truth. Happily, history is there to refute man's pretensions, and the proof it gives of the need of light—that is, of revelation—to give conscience its power is all-important. Whatever the cause—I do not doubt the fall, and Satan's power, man's utter alienation from God, is—but whatever the cause is, the fact is so. By the Christian revelation, partially by the Jewish one, man had light to judge the absurdities and corruptions of paganism; without that, in point of fact, he never did. Conscience, one may see, existed, but was religiously incompetent—incompetent to judge of a revelation, that is, of its truth or falsehood. I might question whether Dr. Williams's conscience and reason be much better or sounder in his judgment of the matter. I doubt it very much; but that we may leave. I refer to his attempted justification of heathenism in presence of Christianity, and while favouring those horrible corruptions, questioning the Divine character of both Christianity and its testimony. It seems to me as perverted as the heathenism it defends.

H. In a certain aspect, I judge more so, as it comes after the light. But we will turn to another part of the subject—some of the scientific researches by which they call in question Scripture accounts. It is easy to speak of chronology, of which Dr. Williams remarks, “Dr. Bunsen says, with quaint strength, ‘there is no chronological element in revelation.’” I see neither quaintness nor strength in the remark. I do see sophism and ignorance of the scope and nature of Scripture; because it is impossible to separate chronology and history, and the inquiry into chronology is here with a view to history. Now the moral history of mankind is a large feature in revelation—one of deep import; and the researches or rather suppositions of Dr. Bunsen, in which Dr. Williams revels, are calling in question the chronology in order to set aside the history. Whether Adam lived 130 years, as the Hebrew Bible says, and begat a son, or 230 years, as the Septuagint, is in itself of little moment. It shoves on dates 100 years, but that is all. Quite right to find the truth, if we can; but if it be sought to disturb the history—if (this Dr. Bunsen has too much sense to believe) Adam be not the head of the race—if even Noah be not, and other races escaped the flood, we lose the judgment of the world; the Scripture history, in its deepest moral elements, is trenched on; the perishing of a world is only a national fable belonging to a race, drawn from some local phenomenon. And a flippant remark that chronology is not an element of revelation, is impertinent or dishonest. But I confess I fear somewhat to enter on scientific questions, having really no pretension to be a learned man. My only encouragement is that experience has so taught me the superficial and flippant character of neology, and particularly of English neologists, that I have been emboldened, using books current on the subjects referred to, and the little knowledge I have, to examine the statements that are made, and see how far they are to be relied on. The result for me has been that there is a mass of charlatan-ism. A little knowledge is a dangerous thing. I have only a little; but in their waters I venture to wade. I would first draw your attention to the kind of statements and reasonings: "He could not have vindicated the unity of mankind if he had not asked for a vast extension of time, whether his petition of (sic) 20,000 years be granted or not." Is this serious? "Do we see the historical area of nations and languages extending itself over nearly 10,000 years, and can we imagine less than another 10,000 during which the possibilities of these things took body and form?" Chronology imagined at this rate ceases to be a dry study, no doubt; but a serious one it can hardly be called. "Questions of this kind require from most of us a special training for each; but Baron Bunsen revels in them, and his theories are at least suggestive." Will the reader believe that such crudities are brought to make out history, and the revelling of Baron Bunsen in suggestive theories is to settle chronology and overthrow Scripture? Why? Because it is Scripture. As an ancient document there is nothing to be compared with it. Again: "The Semitic languages, which had as distinct an individuality 4,000 years ago as they have now, require a cradle of larger dimensions than Archbishop Usher's chronology. What further effort is not forced upon our imagination if we would guess the measure of the dim background in which the Mongolian and Egyptian languages, older probably than the Hebrew, became fixed, growing early into the type which they retained." 'Efforts forced on the imagination (hardly forced when a man revels in it) to guess the measure of the dim background of languages, probably older than the Hebrew! You have in this, my dear W., a very fair picture of Baron Bunsen and his suggestive theories. In point of fact, the only probable evidence we have is that these languages were contemporaneous; but the evidence is late; as to writing, the most ancient known in the East received it certainly from Semitic language. Burnouf has proved this in his inquiry into the cuneiform inscriptions of Hamadan. But the date of Mongol is dim enough, no doubt. But let us leave this. His excessive carelessness you may judge from other instances I lit on in Stuart Poole, in Smith's Dictionary, the other day. Bunsen ridicules Baumgarten for making fifty-six pairs out of seventy souls. He had never looked at the chapter, where it is evident that sixty-seven of the seventy were men. It would seem that he has taken Shaul the Levite for Saul the king in 1 Chron. vi. 22. ff. But this is so gross, he may in copying Lepsius, whom he greatly follows, have not seen that it was only a synchronism. I have not Lepsius here. At any rate it is the greatest carelessness. Bunsen set aside, to start with, the divinely-given history. Chronology was not an element of revelation. At any rate, that was the glory of liberal Christian views. And then he revels in suggestive theories. Man has it all to himself. I will examine some; but I thought it well to notice Dr. Williams's own account of Baron Bunsen's procedure. Dr. Williams asks: How many years are needed to develop modern French out of Latin?—say 900, that is, from 600 to Francis I. Well, what then? How many the divergence of the members of the Indo-European family? Probably, very various; some very early, some much later. The dispersion of the Aryan race is beyond history, and they seem to have had already dialects. The only supposed date is within Septuagint chronology. The Vedas do not go more than to about 1,400 years before Christ, leaving 1,000 years within even Hebrew chronology to the flood. Circumstances influence the growth of dialects immensely. A tribe moves from a mountain to a plain, or to another climate; the names caused by local circumstances disappear—plants, cattle, terms connected with culture and the like, all change. When long remaining in one place a language changes; but it is easily seen it is in its forms by civilization. When tribes are entirely separate, with little intercourse, they become distinct languages very rapidly, though grammatical forms are analogous, or the style, as in North America. When a language is widely diffused, and there is much communication, it remains one, and is only developed according to a pretty constant rule, generally of abbreviation of forms. But if 900 or 1,000 years sufficed to change and form a new language, that time can well be allowed to the history of the Sanscritian or Zend, not more than there is room for in Scriptural chronology. Take notice, too, that all this reasoning sets out with treating the history of the tower of Babel as a fable. It is not a nicety of interpretation, but a total rejection of the whole theory. But I should think, while confessing that I am no comparative philologist, that Dr. Williams can know little or nothing about the matter. He says (and all the world is always to understand that the new theology brings from its stores well-authenticated results, mentioned as if every tolerably well-read man should be aware of it): “When again we have traced our Gaelic and our Sanskrit to their inferential pre-Hellenic stem,” &c. Now I apprehend this sentence betrays total ignorance of the whole subject. Hellenism, or Greek, as well as Latin, is a comparatively modern daughter of Sanskrit itself; Zend, as its twin sister, has its mixed or corrupted mediæval derivation in Pehlvi, and its direct one in modern Persian and the Teutonic languages. Sanskrit is not traced to a pre-Hellenic stem, It is the root or stem of Hellenistic and Latin languages. Zend and Sanskrit are very closely allied dialects of what is often now called Aryan—Zend north of the Himalayas, Sanskrit south. The classical Sanskrit of the Vedas is still more closely allied to Zend than the common Sanskrit. Zend is hard in pronunciation, Sanskrit soft. Gaelic or Irish is held by some able philologists to be the closest existing representative of Sanskrit in the West, with the richest vocabulary of words. Others cite the Lithuanian as having the closest resemblance. This is from the use of soft instead of hard sounds in both, which characterises Sanskrit, as contrasted with Zend. But Irish is pronounced hard, and gutturally. Lithuanian German is very soft; but, as is well known, southern German differs from northern in the hardness of its guttural pronunciation. The aspirates and ellipses in Erse arise from the utterance stopping half-way between the preceding and following sound. If you examine bata (battha), mo wata, ar mbata, you will find the change—that w is half-way between o and b, and m between r and b. It is an imperfect, undefined utterance. To return to our dates. The most careful research into monuments compared with Berosus, whose chronology the monuments constantly confirm, and other chronological elements and dates, gives about 2,234 years before Christ for the foundation of the first Chaldean kingdom. The common biblical chronology gives for the flood 2,348. It is alleged by German critics following Berosus (I say German, as freed from Scripture authority), that there was a Median dynasty of eight kings, and this is conjecturally carried to 2458 B.C., 110 years before the ordinary Hebrew date of the flood. According to the Septuagint chronology, the flood was B.C. 3155, leaving 697 years between the flood and the first kingdom known to Berosus in Chaldea. This Median kingdom I should not be disposed to reject, though its duration and character be conjectural and uncertain. Because the Chaldean or Babylonish, as we know, was the seat and centre of idolatry, invented and established as a system. Previous to and concurrent with this was another and less outwardly gross idolatry—the worship of fire, and so far the sun and stars. Sabæism contrasted with Ionism. This did not reject star, or at any rate planet worship, but connected it with making gods of men, of their ancestors— and first of Noah and his sons.

Now this Median kingdom would be the prevalence of Sabæism—the first Chaldean, simply the kings of Babel from Nimrod, setting up systematic idolatry. All tradition points to such a change in these days. Epiphanius—no great authority, it is true, but a witness of tradition in this respect—says it took place in the days of Serug, Abraham's great-grandfather. That idolatry had then come in, we learn from Joshua xxiv. It was the occasion of calling out Abraham to be the stock of a separate people, that the knowledge of the true God might not be wholly lost; so that probably it was then quite established and prevalent, yet not very long established. The uniformity of its fundamental elements in India, Egypt, Greece, and Rome, show a regularly invented system connected with the deluge and Noah, and the prevalent principle in all countries connected with it of the setting up their first ancestors as the gods of their country gives its fixed principle. This, with their identification with some planet. Thus we have 2234 B.C. for the first Chaldean monarchy; 2348 B.C. according to the Hebrew chronology, the date of the flood; 3155 B.C. according to the Septuagint, when our review says 2234 for the first Median conquest of Babylon. It is very certainly an error of Bunsen's, or a blunder of Dr. Williams's. It is the date of the first Chaldean kingdom, which overthrew the Median—Berosus calls it Chaldean, at any rate; and the monuments, if not using the word Chaldean (which does not occur till the Assyrian inscriptions in the ninth century before Christ), confirm the fact of a series of kings reigning in the countries whence Abraham came—called by Berosus Chaldean, or by Scripture Ur of the Chaldees. Now learned men may discuss these dates. We have no objection, but we have data, not suggestive theories. Research into Egyptian chronology and history leads to the conclusion that the suggestive theories of Baron Bunsen fall before the facts. The attempt of Lepsius to set up the long period which Manetho's lists would make out, and on which Baron Bunsen greatly builds, has no foundation to rest upon. The whole is utterly superficial. Not only does Manetho speak of contemporary princes, but the stelæ and tablet monuments give unequivocal proofs of the coexistence of kings of different dynasties, sometimes subordinate one to another. I need not enter now into the details with you. But the names are brought together of two, and even of several dynasties on the same monument, so that the chronology founded on their being in succession one to another is a delusion from beginning to end. But, leaving all reference to Scriptural chronology out, the commencement of Egyptian history has been estimated at some 2,650 years before Christ. Now no one, I suppose, pretends to give these dates accurately; but the coincidence of the Asiatic and African empires gives a general probability; while Baron Bunsen's is founded on want of research, on speculations from the boastful and legendary lists of Manetho, and the desire to make the time long, and chronology no element of revelation. He has neglected the evidently important evidence furnished by the monuments (some, perhaps, ascertained indeed since his time), of the co-existence of dynasties, and of very many too—perhaps eight at a time. Moreover, his whole theory as to old and middle and new empires falls to the ground wholly, save so far as the fact of the presence of Hyksos kings goes, and with these other dynasties subsisted nearly all the time. His whole Egyptian system is, as Dr. Williams has described it, revelling in suggestive theories. The speculative results of elaborate inquiry into the great Aryan or Iapetic emigration supposes it was 3,000 years before Christ, and this is avowedly mere theory. This you will find in Pictet's book. I have thus taken up the historical part, and, I think, shown that all is theory. But I would still draw your attention for a moment to the kind of reasoning. Even Dr. Williams, however gluttoning in the helps to incredulity, is obliged to demur, and finds puzzling circumstances in the strained etymologies which are made its foundation; but adds a justification of Bunsen, which reaches far beyond all my conceptions of the possibilities of logic: "That our author would not shrink from noticing this, is shown," that is, noticing how he strained etymologies to make the two antediluvian genealogies legendary, "by the firmness with which he relegates the long lives of the first patriarchs to the domain of legend." Is not that a proof? It is this. His arbitrary boldness in making a legend of Scripture statement shows that he will judge his own arbitrariness in making legends of genealogies by strained etymologies; at any rate, Dr. Williams admires him—revels in the Baron's firmness.

W. But it is difficult to consider all this to be serious. I am glad you spoke of the Assyrian and Egyptian history, but the style of Bunsen's and Dr. Williams's reasoning seems to me trifling almost, hardly worth notice.

H. It would not be if it were not an attack against Scripture; but, though it be wearisome, it is well to show the stuff these neological reasonings are made of. Bear with me yet a little, while I quote a passage or two. 'The idea of bringing Abraham into Egypt as early as 2876 is one of our author's most doubtful points, and may seem hardly tenable.' (According to monuments, it was before Menes, when the gods or heroes were reigning.) But why is this date? Some proof, perhaps, is given. Here it is:—"He wanted time for the growth of Jacob's family into a people of two millions"—(a question discussed on the shortest supposed period by Clinton Fynes, and others). However, Baron Bunsen wanted time for it, and he felt bound to place Joseph under a native Pharaoh—therefore before the shepherd kings. He also contends that Abraham's horizon is antecedent to the first Median conquest of Babylon, in 2234 B.C. (We have spoken of this point; as far as I can gather, there is no proof or sign of such an event.) So the stay of the Israelites in Egypt is extended to fourteen centuries (it is well he let them go there at all); the 215 years is the time of oppression. Baron Bunsen's history puts me in mind of Vertot's account of a siege—I forget of what town. He had written to have an accurate account of it from one present, but when it came, he said he was very sorry, but he had written his siege. Then Bunsen takes Manetho's wild account of the lepers and Avaris, quoted in Josephus, as confirming the exodus under Menephtah—(the date is very possible, Wilkinson, after the Duke of Northumberland, is disposed to accept it—I think Osborne too); but then says, you must accept the whole history, if you do the confirmation. That is very critical. In this case, no sober person does. And hence it was an invasion by the Jews; and the high hand with which Jehovah led His people, the spoiling of the Egyptians, and the lingering in the peninsula (!), are to be taken as signs, even in the Bible, of a struggle conducted by human means. Can absurdity go further? What do you think the avenger who slew the first-born was?

W. Well, what?

H. “It may have been the Bedouin host, akin nearly to Jethro, and, more remotely, to Israel.”

W. But, my dear H., enough of these excessive puerilities. Surely we need not go further, or waste our time with the foolish and unbridled licence of an imagination which leads to no result. It is refreshing to turn to the gravity and simplicity of Scripture accounts. The moral truths so richly encased in its simple tale are enough for a mind rightly tuned to see its divine character. It is well, perhaps, to see the contrast, and how God allows a most amiable, learned, and attractive mind to run into absurdity and senseless suppositions, when it lends itself to speculations which baser minds seek to profit by, against all truth.

H. I have done. But it was well that the true character of these speculations should appear. We will turn to other points.

W. But I should like to ask you a question. How comes it that Dr. Williams recognises the untenableness, as in this last case, of the statements and the straining of etymology for proofs, and yet delights in bringing forward the conclusions, and presses with satisfaction the results?

H. Allow me to reply by asking a question too. Do you believe that on any subject but one he would admit the premisses to be false, and delight in the conclusions?

W. Well, I suppose not. No one would. Where the will is not engaged, no man pleads that premisses are false, and conclusions excellent.

H. You have answered yourself. See what is said: "It is easier to throw doubt on some of the arguments than to show that the conclusion . . . is improbable." He is speaking of Bunsen's requiring twenty thousand years.

The truth is, the idea of human excellency and their own superior powers of criticism has led them to reject Scripture a priori, because it sets down man as wicked and lost; and then to loosen by speculative suppositions the bands of all proof whatever. Bunsen, building on an excessively uncritical, unphilosophical estimate of Egyptian periods—speculations which have neglected all careful research into the facts—has concluded that the emigration into Egypt was ante-Noahic, the flood only partial, and Scripture not worth a straw, save as bright and eminent individuals gave an impulse suited to their day. His writings are a kind of skating over the surface of facts. I will give you here a specimen of Scriptural interpretation, to show how far solidity of judgment can be looked for in Bunsen's writings:—"In the event of Pentecost, not only the first legislation of mankind founded on the permanent law of the conscience, became a reality, but the whole distinguishing character of the eighteen centuries which separate us from that event, was typified and foreshadowed." All well, save that the Holy Ghost is not alluded to, only permanent conscience. I will refer to this further on. But now: "In what did that miracle consist? One hundred and twenty persons—not only Galileans, as they were naturally supposed to be, but believers from various parts— assembled together on that festive day, expecting the end of the world. Suddenly, during a violent storm of wind, accompanied by lightning, the persons so assembled felt moved apparently to praise God, not in the formularies of their sacred language, but in the profane sounds of their heathenish mother tongues, of which the Greek was foremost, as the Spirit gave them utterance.” “What more portentous or deeply significant sign could there be that religion was henceforth to cease to be an external or sacerdotal and ceremonial worship? At this moment, and with that sound, the true temple of God was opened. This was in reality the temple which Christ had said He could raise on the ruins of the old.” “The speakers themselves were overpowered by the sudden wind and scintillating flashes of the electric fluid (v. 3),” —the verse is, “And there appeared unto them cloven tongues, like as of fire, and it sat upon each of them” — “while those who gathered round and listened to them were no less awe-struck by hearing the praises of God and wonderful things uttered in their own tongues, which they little expected to hear from Galileans (v. 4–8). The speakers at first made convulsive sounds, but soon recovered their equilibrium (I feel it hard to preserve one’s own); not like those who, in the time of St. Paul, after having lost, in the midst of the Divine service, the power of articulation (that is, speaking with a tongue, note), were unable to express their emotion otherwise than by sounds of the brute creation, extorted by their overpowering sensations. Nor, according to St. Luke’s account, were the pious hearers overcome to such an extent as some later learned interpreters appear to have been. They did not regard the screams which had been uttered at the first moment, but listened to what they heard spoken in their own tongue. If this be a rationalistic explanation, it is that of St. Peter. (!) Where does that Apostle state that he and his friends received the power of speaking languages not their own, or that the utterance of convulsive sounds was a proof of Jesus of Nazareth being the Christ, and of the Spirit of God having come down upon the believers in the Galilean"?

W. It is inconceivable; one's only comfort is that its folly proves honesty.

H. I agree with you. I believe there was a love of good, and that from God, in this amiable man. Are you aware that he declared, on his death-bed, that Christ was all, and that only was life—all else nothing.

W. It is a sweet and joyful thought to know it. How wonderful, and wonderfully above man, is the grace of God!

H. It is, and sweet to turn to and dwell on.

W. But how is it possible that one can be blinded to such a point?

H. It is hard to tell. That man should say, "I do not believe the account," is intelligible enough. But to take it and make this out of it is hard to understand. I account for it by the Divine instinct which cannot bear to give up the words of eternal life, and the vanity which would go on with the supposed progress of science. All is the contradiction of the Scripture statement. There was no wind, but a sound like one. The scintillating electricity of the storm resting on their heads would be rather awkward. There are no convulsive sounds, no screams; they are all Galileans, contrasted with devout men from every nation under heaven. Peter had no need to say they spake with tongues, because it was heard by all, and is stated by the historian. He does, both here and in his defence as to going to Cornelius, refer to it as the proof of Christ's glory and the seal of faith; and tells them if they repented and were baptized they would receive it too. Each particular is exactly contrary to the history, and the wind and electricity contemptible. Think of Paul saying they were not to speak with a tongue except there was an interpreter, when they were the sounds of the brute creation—he spake with tongues more than they all—I suppose of different brutes. But the explanation of Baron Bunsen is important here as regards the system of the school. "With true prophetic spirit St. Peter applied to this event what had been foretold of the Spirit of God, which was to come in the last days, and to be recognized by the outpouring of intelligence and wisdom over the unlearned men and women even of the lowest classes." Now this is not true. He speaks of visions and dreams, not of wisdom and intelligence. But further: "No, he tells them a story as simple as it is true; the great event of his days, and of all days—the glorification of God through Christ, not as an external fact, but as a Divine principle of life in mankind." Now how striking it is that an upright mind, for such I doubt not was Baron Bunsen's, under the influence of this deceit of Satan, can misrepresent a statement, or rather, just as the Baron does in Egyptian history, give what he thinks ought to be here instead of what is. There is not one word of the glorification of God through Christ, but of God's glorifying Christ, whereupon the Holy Ghost was shed forth. He speaks of the power of God raising up from the dead and setting Christ, as man, at His right hand, and that He, having received the Holy Ghost from the Father, had sent, not a storm and electricity to rest on the disciples' heads, but the Holy Ghost. Nor does he even say one word of a principle of Divine life in mankind. Christianity is that; but here there is not a word of it. The Baron adds: "On that day, accordingly, not only the Christian Church was born, but also the Christian state." I only add this to show how all is the theory of his mind without reference to fact. Where is 'the Christian state' on Pentecost?

I need not say I do not quote this to refute it—it would not deserve it; but to show the character and spirit, and materials of which the new school is made up. God's exalting Christ—overstepping the narrow bounds of Judaism, to visit all nations in grace—the blessed truth of another Comforter, which Christ had promised, is not seen for a moment. An invented storm, an electricity which would have left very few Galileans there: what folly replaces it?

W. Refuting it would indeed be absurd; but it is a singular phenomenon, such an entire aberration of mind.

H. It is a state, and the proof of the folly, of man's mind, when, as such, it pretends to judge of God's acts. But I have a quotation from another part of Baron Bunsen's works which distinctly shows his notion—the school's notion—of revelation, and with this view I quote it:—"Such a direct communication of the Divine mind as is called revelation, has necessarily two factors, which are co-operating in producing it. The one is the infinite factor, or the direct manifestation of eternal truth to the mind, by the power which that mind has of perceiving it; for human perception is the correlative of Divine manifestation." "This infinite factor is, of course, not historical; it is inherent in every individual soul, but with an immense difference of degree."

"The second factor of revelation is the finite, or external. This mode of Divine manifestation is, in the first place, a universal one—the universe is Nature. In a more special sense, it is an historical manifestation of Divine truth through the life and teaching of higher minds among men. These men of God are eminent individuals, who communicate something of eternal truth to their brethren." "The difference between Jesus and the other men of God is analogous to that between the manifestation of a part and the totality and substance of the Divine mind." I cannot follow the wild idealism of Bunsen in all its details. I may give as an example of it his interpretation of "Marvel not at this: for the hour is coming in the which all that are in their graves shall hear His voice, and shall come forth, those that have done good to the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil to the resurrection of damnation." He translates, he says, from Semitic into Japetic language; so he speaks thus: "The history of mankind will prove to be the judgment of God. Nations will perish by this judgment, and new nations will arise, and the truth and justice of God will become manifest as well by the destruction of empires as by the awakening of new national life." This is not exceptional. The Son having life in Himself, as the Father in Himself, and authority to execute judgment, means—"This new period of mankind is now beginning; individuals of all nations will be awakened by Divine consciousness (nota bene), and in process of time this Divine principle in man will become the principle of all social relations, governments, and states." Now how entirely opposite this is to Christianity I need not say, which speaks of man as lost, of redemption, of a new Divine life given. But I only introduce it now as showing the excess of spiritual idealism which makes all Baron Bunsen's views and statements a will-o'-the-wisp. The only thing I know like it, and from which much (at any rate in the form and habit of mind) seems to be drawn, is Philo. Of course to Bunsen it came philosophically through Hegel—perhaps Schelling; but Philo is so extraordinarily like, because he connected Judaism and a like system, as Bunsen does Christianity with Hegelianism. I shall recur to this. My present point is the revelation of Christ. I believe Christian instinct gave Bunsen a sense of what Christ was, which pierces through, so great is God's grace. But I will give his ideas of Christ to complete the picture, and then turn to his ideas of revelation. I say idea, for Bunsen is an honest man, and gives it; but we must never trust words in these men's mouths, because they all use common Christian terms, but they mean with them totally different things.

W. That I see plain enough. I am getting gradually hold of the system. We must have the key to the cypher. When once, however, one sees this, it produces just distrust as to all they say. They cover themselves with the mantle of Christianity to pierce it under the fifth rib. They are very Joabs in their character. They speak peaceably to Abner in the king's gate, but on has to learn to be aware that they have a hidden sword. However, the fraud is tolerably apparent. God ever takes care of His people.

H. In a very angry correspondence in France, which I have seen published as a pamphlet since our first conversation, it is seriously proposed that they should openly say what they mean and think on the great truths of Christianity, that the mass of professing Christians may know what they really hold. They speak of Christ, His gracious life and the like, and unsuspecting persons assume commonly-received truths as at the basis; but the select few are initiated, and propagate doubts and unbelief; and the work is actively carried on. Such at least is the distinct statement in these papers; and one sees the shrinking from open dealing, or meeting it clearly, in the replies. At any rate, the first part is true, for that I have met with—the speaking of Christ as if all was right, while not one word of commonly held Christian truth was believed, yet the same terms largely employed. This is the case with Bunsen, only he honestly states what he thinks. Thus he speaks of judgment. But what does this mean? ‘The conscience of man, now represented by Jesus of Nazareth, will be the judge of man—first, as to individual conduct, and in process of time, through faith in his Spirit, as to national affairs’. What becomes of the judgment of quick and dead now? Christianity is gone for a reverie.

Again, he speaks of Christ's unity with the Father. He is identified and one with God. That sounds well enough. But what is it? “The willing self-sacrifice of Jesus is the cause of his unity with the Father.” It is a mere moral idea. The truth is gone, and see how it works. He adds (Christ speaks), “What I say of myself, that I am one with God, is true of all men.”

Having shown the genius and character of all this teaching, I will now, before applying it to revelation, quote to you his interpretation of the Apostle's (John's) teaching concerning Christ:—

“Before the visible universe existed, there was in God the conscious thought of Himself, as active reason. This thought was identical with God, the substance of the universe; it was God thinking Himself, making Himself objective to Himself.” (As the Neoplatonists say, the intelligent no longer as existence, but in activity becoming the intelligible. For this is mere Neoplatonism, and, indeed, so does Bunsen explain it.) “This, then, is the Divine existence of the Word, as active reason;” according to Philo and the Alexandrian fathers, ενδιαθετος. “The creation of the universe is the manifestation in space and time of the same thought of God of Himself. There was nothing created which has not the principle of existence in that thought of God of Himself.” These are the ideas of Plato, the νοητον of Philo. “The universe, thus created, continues to have the principle of life in this Divine self-consciousness; this principle of substantial existence is also the intellectual principle in man.”

“God's eternal thought of Himself became personal in finite existence in a man conscious of his Divine nature. In this man, that Divine Word lived amongst us, and we behold in Jesus Divine glory and truth. He alone, therefore, could declare to mankind the nature of God, for that primitive consciousness lived in Him constantly and perfectly.”

I rejoice to think that true divinely-given faith in Christ pierces through Bunsen's idealism; I rejoice heartily in it. It is swamped in idealism, but there is not the cold, calculating infidelity of the Essays and Reviews. Dr. Williams's language is, “The son of David by birth is the Son of God by the spirit of holiness” (a false citation). “What is flesh is born of flesh, what is spirit is born of spirit.” This he calls the incarnation becoming purely spiritual. Having gladly owned this as to Baron Bunsen, which is my real feeling, we may pursue the research into the system. Save the last phrase I have quoted, it is merely a reproduction of Philonian, that is Alexandrian, Platonism, adapted by idealism to Scripture statements.

The Logos was first ενδιαθετος—immanent reason in God; then προφορικος; and thus the universe (not in matter, but existing in the thought of God in idea) was the λογος. Then the λογος became the band and support of it when it took a form. So here with Baron Bunsen in the wild notion that the universe, thus created, continues to have the principle of life in this Divine self-consciousness. It is a living being. All this is pure Philonism. So is the notion that the eminent man—“the wise man,” says Philo—has this partially in him, partakes intrinsically of the Divine λογος in his reason. As in Bunsen, repeated in a passage I have not quoted: “In the progress of history, this principle (life in Divine self-consciousness) manifested itself as intelligence”—the σοφος and επιστημη of Philo. The only point where Bunsen leaves Philo, as far as I can see, is when he speaks of Christ as having the fulness of this in a finite person; but even here, with a very slight modification, Philo applies this to Moses. He could not see God Himself, but entered into the darkness and saw the original pattern of heavenly things. He is called God. “But what, did He not enjoy also a greater fellowship with the Father and Maker of all things; having been counted worthy of the same title: for He was called the God and King of the whole nation, and is said to have entered into the thick darkness where God was, that is, into the formless and invisible and incorporeal pattern essence of beings: mentally contemplating what cannot be seen by mortal nature.” (De Vitá Mosis, Mangey, 108 for 106.)

The prophets only inquire, and get answers. So the law of Moses is the perfect expression of the Divine mind, and serves as such, and will be for all ages. It corresponds to the harmony of the universe, and is in unison with the reason (λογω) of the eternal nature. (De Vitá Mosis, Mangey, ii. 142.)

Bunsen's notion of the prophetic spirit in all eminent men is also Philo's, παντι ανθρωπω ασειω ο ιερος λογος προφητειαν μαρτυρει. But the word of prophecy has Moses for its name (Man. i. 652). Moses has power over all the elements of nature; each one of them obeys him (Man. ii. 105. So Mangey, ii. 107—for 105.) He took the Divine excellencies as preferable to worldly goods, so that God rewarded him with great and perfect riches. The reading is then said to be faulty in the text, ισοτης (equality). It may be so, but I am not quite clear. Mangey reads, those (riches) of all the universe. But it then goes on: For having been thought worthy of being declared partaker of His own lot [God] granted him the whole world. The elements own him Lord. "Nor is," he adds, "that wonderful; for if, as the proverb says, all things belonging to friends are common—and the prophet is called the friend of God, as a consequence as to usufruct—he will be partaker and companion of all his possession." What is this but Bunsen's Jesus of Nazareth's self-sacrifice—the cause of his unity with the Father?

It is, I think, a mistake, unless I have overlooked some passage, to say that Moses is called ο ιερος λογος, the sacred Word, as has been alleged by Gfrörer. This applies to the Scripture, but he is set in the same place really in the de migratione Abrahami. He is the διανοια, the mind and thought of God, and Aaron his prophet to declare it. This under another name is the same thing, but it is not immanent as the λογος, but more a gift. But then, on the other hand, the πνευμα αγιον abode always with him. In most it visits and goes—is an afflatus, but in Moses abides, τουτω μεν ουν το θειον αι παρισταται. (De Gigantibus, Man. i. 269, 270).

I will not go further. He largely insists in more than one place on his entering into the thick darkness—so as prophet he knew all that as king, lawgiver, and priest he could not; and all completed his knowledge, he is (M. ii. 145) inspired, has breathed into him heavenly love; what he says is an oracle λογιον εκ προσωπου δι' ερμηνειαν unmixed, not as others from inquiry and answer (Man. ii. 163.)

W. It would be curious if Bunsen's wanderings were only a reproduction of Philo. But where are you leading my thoughts with all this?

H. Not an unnatural question. First we are examining a professed review of Bunsen, and inquiry into his real views is the best answer; and it shows the true character of the teaching sought to be introduced. Philo indeed was, while for ever allegorising, so far soberer, that he recognises the literal history, though, like Augustine, saying when it is dishonouring to God's thoughts, it must be taken mystically. Still he respects the written Word far more than Bunsen and our Essayists. But I had also a more precise object. I have only, could only, in our brief intercourse bring forward points of contact, but the more Philo's views are before the mind as a whole, the more the similarity; the identity, I may say, is apparent. Another character of the λογος which Philo gives will lead me to the point. The λογος, or Divine reason, is faith in us; that is, the λογος, or Divine immanent reason, becoming in its acting in man intelligence, the ορθος λογος, or right reason in the abstract, which is Divine, is, as far as it acts, right reason in man, i.e., in the wise; and the archetypal idea is in the mind of man faith; he has seized it as having, as the wise man, this right reason in himself, it being in himself so far as he is wise. That which is seized is the idea in God, but it is the idea in the man's mind, the λογος being his intelligence. It is a copy of the original copy, or production of the inherent mind of God. As inherent, it is unknown. As become intelligible in the λογος, an idea, it is νοητος, capable of being a subject of thought; and the human mind, which is the action of the λογος in us, thinks it, has the idea, believes it as truth. Thus it is faith. This seems subtle, but it is not difficult to understand. The thinking power is not thinking. When I think I have a thought. Thus what was simply intelligent, capable of thinking, is intelligible, becomes in the produced thought a possible subject of another's apprehension. If the same intelligence is in another as his mind, it is the spring of the same thought in him. The λογος as immanent reason in God is unknown, but as a whole of thoughts, when thinking has taken place, when the Divine mind has had or produced thoughts, is not all known, but νοητος, knowable; and then archetypal ideas become by the λογος being also our reason, our ideas. Hence the λογος is the archetypal idea, and faith, according to Philo. Forgive me this dose of Alexandrian philosophy. You will see its application to revelation in a moment.

W. I begin to catch it already. But it denies positive revelation. It is a kind of deifying the intelligence of man, making him, in some strange way, the proper source of the same thoughts, called faith, and so, eventually, a part of God.

H. Yes. This comes from the connexion of conscience and reason on moral subjects, the judging process of the mind and perception of good and evil. Thus, where the will, or that in which we take pleasure, coincides with the conscience—the judgment of good and evil—there is moral perfection. God is realised; or, as Bunsen says, man is God.

W. But then, if I understand this, it is a direct denial of all revelation. It is a partial possession of the Divine nature, which may be morally complete, in virtue of which man has in himself the thoughts of God, and that naturally, which equally denies what is revealed—the sinful alienation of man from God. Scripture says, "All the imagination of the thoughts of his heart were only evil, and that continually;" and the deep practical experience of one who understood the spirituality of God's law could say, "I know that in me"—that is, in my flesh—"dwelleth no good thing;" and that even when to will was present with him, how to perform that which was good he found not.

H. Precisely. It is a denial of revelation, and a denial of the truth as to man; and, in revelation, a dropping -- I will not say denial — of every Divine object.

W. But I have a difficulty here, because Philo surely recognized a Divine revelation.

H. Your remark is quite in place; but it leads to the confirmation and clearing up of the real truth on this question — “What is revelation?” From his education and habits as a Jew, he distinctly recognized the inspiration of the Old Testament — particularly of Moses’ writings, but of all; and inspiration in the fullest sense — the operation of the Holy or prophetic Spirit; so that man was wholly shut out. He was far more a believer in his theory on this subject — very far — than Bunsen or the rationalists, even the most moderate of them. But two things are to be observed: first, he philosophized independently of the Scriptures, though he sought to bring them in as confirmatory, and allegorized them even where he owned them to be historical. Abraham meant one idea, Israel another, Jacob another. He often admitted only ideas — no literal history at all. He was the most outrageous spiritualizer, but reducing all to man as he is looked at as virtuous. Hence evident inconsistencies. But what is more material, there was no Divine object in revelation for him. God remained necessarily unknown in Himself. The revelation he had was of ideas; the λογος — the universal idea of all — the universe; the bringing this idea into finite man’s mind a little world of answering ideas, formed a microcosm as the philosophers called it. Man was, when virtuous, when partaker of θειων αρετων (Divine virtues), an αστειος ανηρ (Bunsen’s eminent men), a possessor, as we have seen, of the ορθος λογος, which, in its infinitude, was a kind of middle being between God and creatures (the evident origin of Arianism, and the early philosophical Christianity of Alexandria). The law for him was the expression of this perfect or right reason, and was to be perpetual and universal. But there were thus only great principles and ideas to be made good — there was no Divine object at all. God was inaccessible.

The λογος comes out as a universal archetypal idea, realized finitely in creation, but not as a personal object of faith, though sometimes treated almost as a person, because acting in power; and this λογος was man's intelligence. Messiah is only referred to as a conqueror to come, subduing the Gentiles, and making good Jewish hopes; beasts to be tamed—men too; sickness to depart; the Jews to be a kind of world priests. There is no proper revealed Divine object of faith. The soul is an αποστιασμα, a shred, an απαντασμα, a shining forth, a ray, an εκμαγειον εμφορες, a corresponding impress of God. It existed before, came into a body, and so was lowered and dualized; (and this circumscription of our spirits in the limits of flesh and time, practical selfishness, Bunsen reckons the fall;) and when it dies, goes back to heaven, restored to unity. There is a reproduction of the Word in the soul, but no revealed object before it. This part of man is reason and conscience. Now you will find that this makes the ground taken by the new school most distinct. They claim the title of reason and conscience to judge of all, that is, of the finite λογος, so to speak, in man—the moral perceptive power in man to judge of everything. By what? By itself. Man, as he is, is the measure of right and wrong, and good and evil. Now, if the Word has been made flesh, God revealed in man, this cannot be. He is the true and perfect measure, and His words, expressing what He is, will judge men; not now, unless inwardly; but when the time of gracious revelation is over, the same will judge him in the last day. Now this is Christianity in its great elementary truths. It declares man has failed, and is evil, though he had a conscience. God had taken care that when he left God and sinned, and sought independence (i.e., sin as to will, as corruption is it as to lust), he should carry a conscience, a knowledge of good and evil, with him. He has sinned without a law, and wallowed in corruption; he has sinned under law, which forbade the corruption, and denied the independence, claiming obedience, and therein righteousness.

Nay, he has sinned in rejecting goodness itself when it came into the world, after all this. Now, wrath is revealed from heaven against both ungodliness and unrighteousness of men who hold the truth in unrighteousness. But withal God's righteousness is revealed, not on a principle of works—man was judged and condemned on that principle—but as God's righteousness by faith, and so to every one, without law or under law, who believed. But how? In a Divine object presented—God Himself manifested in grace, as man dying to put away sin, that blessing might be in righteousness, and no allowance of evil, and a new Divine life communicated. In a word, God is revealed in Christ, to be the condemnation of flesh and man, but to be a new eternal life come down from heaven, making men thus partakers of the Divine nature; and while putting away sin, and glorifying God in this respect, giving a perfect object of this life—the Father revealed in the Son. A Divine object is before us. The Word made flesh, “we beheld His glory, the glory as of an only begotten from the Father.” He “dwelt among us, full of grace and truth.” I have here, very imperfectly, but sufficiently at this moment, sketched the revelation—a revealed object. My purpose here, of course, is not to unfold doctrine, but give the character of the revelation. Now the new school comes in and says, “But I must judge this by what is in man.” Nay, I say, it judges what is in man—in grace and for his good—but it is the truth. Christ is the truth, and judges man. It is a revelation after man has had full scope with conscience, reason, and a perfect rule for it, the law; and all in vain. It is a revelation coming because that was insufficient, because man was incompetent, and proves it; and brings in salvation in a new revealed object, which is not what was in man, but in God—a second man, but the Lord from heaven.

Let us now see how Bunsen's statement as to revelation embodies the evil principle I have referred to. He says:—“Such a direct communication of the Divine mind as is called revelation has necessarily two factors which are co-operating in producing it. The one is the infinite factor, or the direct manifestation of eternal truth to the mind, by the power which that mind has of perceiving it; for human perception is the correlative of Divine manifestation." Now, absurd as this is, it is plain enough. It is Philo's ορθος λογος, right reason, and faith, or the reason and conscience of the new infidel school. A manifestation to by the power of perceiving is absurd—absurd in every case. It supposes an object, but an object by a power of perceiving. Now God can will an object, but needs then no revelation, of course. If man perceives, he must have something to perceive; it is not manifested by his power to perceive; or he creates, or has the Divine nature, with its thoughts, as a given mind. This is just Philo, and is false, metaphysically and morally, because he is not infinite, and he is evil. Scripture makes the contrast, and refers the knowledge of the Divine mind to the believer only, and the Holy Ghost, who shows things to us. "What man knows the things of a man save the spirit of the man which is in him? so no man knows the things of God but the Spirit of God. Now we have received, not the spirit of the world, but the Spirit which is of God, that we might know the things which are freely given to us of God." A man knows the things of a man by the spirit of man; the things of God (these are new, freely given things, objects not inherent in the mind), the Spirit of God only. He is given to them that believe, takes the things of Christ and shows them to us. I am not arguing now whether Scripture be true; but showing that the Christian system is directly in every part in antagonism with the system we are examining.

W. Most clearly, and, I may say, rationally and morally so; but perfectly opposed in every particular.

H. What I think striking is, that it goes over the same ground, the mind, its thoughts, conscience, relationship of God to man, our being His offspring; but in every point, instead of building up the competency of man in his old position, treats him as incompetent and fallen, and brings in a new thing, a second man, the revelation of God, and of the Father, and of the Son.

It shows liberty from rites and legal ceremonies, the bondage of the law, the higher prophetic light, even before Christ; but instead of reducing it into the limits of the Adam nature to exalt man, that is, self, it uses it to show him condemned in his Adam condition, incapable of thus knowing God, and gives new life, new objects, a new state, and a perfect revelation of all that was needed to introduce it, and to be that on and in which it lived.

W. But Baron Bunsen gives a second factor.

H. He does, but we do not gain much there; It "is the finite, or external. This mode of Divine manifestation is, in the first place, a universal one; the universe, or nature. In a more special sense, it is an historical manifestation of Divine truth through the life and teaching of higher minds among men. These men of God are eminent individuals, who communicate something of eternal truth to their brethren, as far as they themselves are true. They have in them the conviction, that what they say and teach of things Divine is an objective truth," "will last" therefore. But mark, only a truth: "The difference between Jesus and the other men of God is analogous to that between the manifestation of a part, and of the totality and substance of the Divine mind." Thus Christ is a perfect revealer at best, not a personal object of faith to whom we are subject as the Son. That is, my mind perceives truth partially. His completely, and so teaches. Thus it is expressed, "God's eternal thought of Himself, became personal in finite existence in a man, conscious of his Divine nature." Remark, He becomes personal, and is then finite. He is Son, and God is Father only in a finite way. Otherwise, "He is God's thought of Himself in space and time." "It has the principle of life in this Divine self-consciousness." "That primitive consciousness lived in Him constantly and perfectly,"—in Jesus. The former part is pure Philonism ; the latter, the incarnation of God's eternal thought of Himself in a man, who thus lived in the consciousness of his Divine nature, is, of course, not Philo's.

But we know now what revelation means, and why the reviewer speaks of the revelation of Christ, and of not confining it to Him.

I proceed with Bunsen. "God reveals, that is to say, manifests Himself directly to mankind by the mind. This manifestation addresses itself to man's rational conscience, or to the consciousness of truth and goodness. This direct manifestation is that of the Eternal Word or Reason, and is the key to the indirect manifestation of God to man through the creation and through history." Hence, "there must be faith in the Divine element of the soul." "The contemplation of God in the history of mankind, is the most natural and most universal means of strengthening the innate faith of the soul in its own destiny."

"The Scriptures of the Old and New Testament exhibit such a record of humanity;" "bearing eminently the character of humanity, they are eminently prophetic."

"Christ is the centre of the universal development, typically exhibited in the Jewish records."

He adds, "Moses had coined out of the law of conscience which Abraham had made the distinctive law of his family, the ritualized law of that nation which he formed out of Abraham's descendants." (In another place, he says, "the wickedness and stubbornness of the people obliged him (Moses) to surround this spiritual law (contrary to his original intentions) with ritual and ceremonial regulations.")

"Jesus proclaimed it the law of mankind by attaching it directly, without any national medium, to the consciousness of God Himself dwelling in man and in mankind. He divinized man because He realized God." "He based upon faith in her (the soul's) origin and destiny . . . . the whole social life of mankind."

Hence he holds that, by revolutionary destruction of hierarchy and empires, there will be by the prevalence of conscience a kind of moral millennium.

Now here God dwelling in man, the direct revelation to man's rational conscience, is the Infinite Factor, the judge of all. The finite, and even Christ comes in here (though personally Bunsen ascribes to Him a perfect consciousness of the whole of God's thought of Himself), is a secondary and external one. Mankind's history strengthens the internal, but no more. Jewish records give man's expression of this. Christ is the centre of this finite external one. Eminent men have given it out, as far as they thought they had the perception of truth. Christ is not a part but the whole reason of God in a man, to whom God gave eternal life, for so He says.

But revelation is, as a direct thing, merely and only the perception of truth by man's mind as man, through the eternal reason of God dwelling in him as man. And he must have faith in this divine element in himself. Eminent men may give out their consciousness of it, and, if true, give it out with a conviction that it is lasting truth. But this is all secondary and indirect. Direct revelation is only the inward perceptions of man's natural mind. And the Bible is prophetic in general, not because of its divinity, but because of its humanity, and that it is the expression of what passes in the human mind. The eternal reason of God dwells in man, and man by it perceives, and that is revelation in all. What makes some to be eminent, we are left to conjecture. Philo was dreadfully embarrassed here, too. However, Is this a denial of a revelation or not? Is it a denial of Christian doctrine or not? That is the positive announcement of the word of God claiming absolute authority over the conscience, partial and preliminary by the prophets, fully and openly by Christ and His Apostles. Men were to receive it as the word of God, which was effectual in those that believed. It was for the obedience of faith among all nations—man being darkness, alienated from the life of God through the ignorance that was in him.

W. It is most clearly a positive denial of revelation altogether. For the secondary or finite one is only reproducing the first, and is good only as far as the conviction of the speaker goes, i. e., not God's word. It is a positive denial, too, of the whole doctrine of Christianity, as to the fall of man, and a redemption, and a new life.

H. You can now, too, clearly see why in this system rational conscience is to judge of all else, be it what it may, and this is the essence of their system. Man is to have faith in the Divine element in his own soul. Hence "the evidences of our canonical books and of the patristic authors nearest to them are sufficient to prove illustration in outward act of principles perpetually true (is that revelation?), but not adequate to guarantee narratives inherently incredible or precepts evidently wrong;" i. e., we are finally judges of right and wrong. Now, the Gospels are, in another sense, an "illustration in outward act of principles perpetually true." For God Himself is love and man hatred against Him. But it is a mere record, according to Dr. Williams, of the truth and falsehood, the right and wrong, of which we are judges, as of any other book. It is not a bit more the word of God or a revelation from God than any other book. It may be better if those of whom it relates correctly the facts and sayings were better. But it is no revelation. We are judges of its contents, and select as we please. That is, God has given no revelation at all; for if He has given a positive revelation of His mind, it is quite clear it must both guide and judge us, not we it. The whole system is infidelity without the honesty to own it, and nothing else. And what, consequently, is man according to Baron Bunsen? "The finite realization of the Spirit of God as good in individual consciousness developed in time." We see that all this is historically false, and that man has received everything that is vile, and crucified Him that by their own confession was goodness and truth. No man received

His testimony; those who did receive Him were born not of man nor of the will of the flesh, but of God. It was a work, a new work, wrought in them. They, and they only, set to their seals that God was true. St. Paul further declares, that what he had was communicated to him by the Holy Ghost, that He imparted it in words taught of the Holy Ghost, and that it could only be received by the Holy Ghost in contrast with the natural man. I conclude that the system is historically false, theoretically false: i. e., its pretension that it is rationally Christian is false. It is diametrically opposite to the theory of Christianity and all the principles of Scripture. And in doctrine not merely infidel but anti-Christian. Take away Christianity, and what have you? Let history tell. I must add, that I think it dishonest to use Christian language for the purpose of denying all that the words mean. To say that the perceptions of a man's mind are a revelation from God, is deceiving by an abuse of words. But it is well to get at the fact, that the question is: Is there a revelation or not—a revelation addressed to man, claiming authority over man because it is the word of God? If they say there is not, we know what we are about, which they are doing their best to conceal. In my judgment their views are from Satan himself—the direct work of the enemy—devilish in their nature. I do not use the word as vulgar and abusive, but in its strict and proper sense.

W. Well, I suppose we must admit them to be such if they are not of God; for they are not simply human mistakes and reasonings (though that may be the case as to individuals), but a systematic antagonism to a Divine revelation of the truth, and of the truth revealed.

H. We have one or two points which we should do well to consider. The value of moral and miraculous evidences. It is a subject treated in these Essays, and has its importance.

W. It has considerable importance. Infidelity is evidently natural to the mind of man, i. e., when God is revealed, and the truth. And this question of evidences meets with this propensity in the heart as much as the truth itself.

H. First of all you must remark, that evidences suppose either reluctance to receive or difficulties inherent in man as to the reception of truth. If man's mind met the truth as such at once, there would be no need of any evidences, no need of our new school investigating so much; but men do reason to prove the truth, i. e., it is not intuitively known or necessarily received. The new school declare the human mind productive of truth as being an intelligence which is the Divine Word in finite action in man. Christianity declares the truth to be revealed in and by Christ, and those sent by Him; and as to ordinary men, He has declared, "Because I tell you the truth ye believe me not." And again, "He was in the world, and the world knew Him not. He came to His own, and His own received Him not." "The light shineth in darkness, and the darkness comprehended it not." That truth was found by man is false; it was not. He arrived at, "What is truth?" Christ came to bear witness to it. Now, assuming that there is such a thing as truth (and there must be, or there is nothing; for if there is something, a true statement or knowledge of what it is, is the truth), either man is omniscient, or he wants the truth to be made known to him. If he does, he needs evidences, unless he be so absolutely proper for its reception, that to state it is sufficient for its reception; i. e., unless the truth be self-evident. If he be not so receptive of truth, and we are sure he is not, he needs evidences of it, because he has reluctance or difficulties. But I go further: truth cannot really be self-evident to a creature, because let men be as proud as they will, in a creature the moral condition depends on the object he is occupied with. Is it gold? he is covetous. Power? he is ambitious; and so on. Hence the moral condition is the fruit of the object. There may be lusts and tendencies dominant; but actual character is determined by an object. Now, to know goodness as a creature without a revelation of it, I must be perfectly good.

But I am not—far from it. When therefore it comes, it finds me not perfectly good—i. e., so far averse to what is good. I do not know whether any one pretends to being perfect goodness; if not he is something as a morally active being; he is selfish. Is it not true?

W. Alas! yes.

H. That is, a revelation of perfect goodness meets selfishness, which is incapable of receiving it. Besides, in fact, there is corruption, prejudice, superstition, into which selfishness has formed itself. And God, who is light as well as love, makes havoc with this. “No man having drunk old wine, straightway desireth new, for he saith, the old is better.” If your infidel says, man is innocent, and education has given him prejudices, and connected his will with his lusts, so as to make passions; I say, be it so. I do not believe it; but be it so. But man is educated; he is a Jew, a Romanist, a heathen, a Protestant. Pure truth comes; it meets his prejudices, and evidences are needed. If these are sent it is the activity of grace. They are not simply to prove the truth (to a mind who sees truth as truth, it needs no proof), but to prove it to man, because man is prejudiced, and deeply prejudiced. But man has a conscience, and the truth does reach it even when will is opposed; has a heart, yea selfishness, and is miserable; and can feel goodness, though opposed to the claim of God over his will as light and love (for if God reveals Himself He must claim subjection, and must to bless make man give up his will, that own will, which is alienation from God, and mixes in his lusts): attraction is felt, the claim felt in conscience, the claim of goodness, the beauty of what is holy felt in conscience, what God is is felt; but there are deep obscurities through prejudice and lusts, and reluctance through feeling how much it will cost. Ignorance of what God ought to be, prejudice against what He is. “Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?” What is to be done? Man ought to receive grace and truth, light and love. Yet he would not want it revealed if he were not morally in contradiction of will with it. God gives adequate evidences to overtop the prejudices, to force on the mind that what is presented to it must be a revelation of God. Men have inquired as to receiving truth because of miracles, or miracles because of truth. Both and neither. Men ought to receive truth because it is truth. Abstractedly ought: for unfallen he would not need a revelation; fallen, puts the case that he is indisposed: but, abstractedly, a nature suited to truth would receive the truth. "If I tell you the truth, why do ye not believe me?" But this is not so. Man does not like to come to the light, because his deeds are evil. God therefore in grace gives evidences, miracles if you please, when the revelation of the truth is there. Not when it has been admitted as truth, to speak historically. But this is great grace. "Believe me," says Christ, "that I am in my Father, and my Father in me, or else believe me for the very work's sake." There is the place of truth and of miracles, "which at first began to be spoken by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard it, God bearing witness by signs and miracles," &c., so "confirming the word by signs following." Where faith was founded only on miracles, the Lord did not own it; there was nothing moral in it. But He did give miracles to help men to believe the holy truth of love. But men say, all is to be reduced to general laws; and if anything cannot, it cannot be believed. God would not disturb general laws. The most general law is that God is love, and miracles, used as I have said, show that more than a physical law. I affirm that, compared with miracles, general laws are nothing as a revelation of God. There are general laws, I admit. An increasing number of phenomena may be reduced to them. Perhaps, had we all the secrets of nature, all of them. I will suppose that, however irregular phenomena may appear, all can be reduced to general laws. But I do not know hereby a personal God; I do not know Him morally. All goes on admirably. I am so constituted—for that is the real fact—that, seeing a creature, I suppose a Creator. As has often been said, a design proves to the human mind (rather it is inherent in the idea, that is, in the constitution of man) a designer. When I say design, I think of a person, a cause for what exists. Constituted as I am, I cannot help doing so. Now, this proves I cannot know God; for I cannot think of a thing's existing without a cause. But He exists without a cause, as we have said—that is His very nature of God. And what makes me know there is one, proves I cannot, in the nature of things, know Him. But that is not my object now. The knowledge that there is a God is no personal revelation of God—no revelation at all. I conclude there must be. I am right. I conclude to immense power, and pretty surely to His unity. The Apostle says His eternal power and Godhead—a solemn truth, from which many an inquiry may arise. Where is He? Who is He? Is He good? Does He think now at present of men? Does He govern all things? I have only a conclusion of my own mind that there must be a God of power who made the universe; not that there is. No conclusion gives that, because my conclusion is only the sequence of an idea. But am I in any relationship with Him? am I part of a system governed by general laws, and no more?—for the absoluteness of these is insisted upon. If I am not a part of these general laws, what relationship have I with God? My new-school man tells me I have a conscience and reason, am free, and so forth; that is, I am not governed like a planet by general laws. Ah ah! Then, in all that is really important, that is, what is moral, I am not a mere machine, under a general law. And you would persuade me God is, and cannot help Himself, nor act freely in respect of my freedom. I am free, and He is not. Then certainly I am God, not He. Now, general laws give me no revelation of God personally; and when I enter into detail, I am lost even as to my conclusions. My conscience tells me He must be good. But I look around and see misery, evil; men worshipping Jupiter, Venus, Pluto; men in every degradation that human nature is capable of; babes in torture, grown man in sin, oppression, and a groaning creation. Is that a general law? Where is the goodness? There is another world, you tell me. Perhaps. I hope so. Will the oppressor, the seducer, the corrupter, the tyrant be there? What proof have you? Your instinct tells you so. Is that all you have to comfort me? Has the instinct of men given them any clear idea of it? Had the heathen such? Are life and incorruptibility brought to light anywhere? In theory a God of mere general laws is a dead God for me as to present moral relationship; and, when I turn to facts, I see it is false, or evil must be a general law too. Now, where there is One who reveals the truth, and works miracles, I am brought into relationship with a God who acts personally, so that I know Him. I see what He is, what He is about. He is righteous, He is love. He thought it worth while to come down into a world full of misery, which man's free will had brought in, to show Himself good in it, more mighty than the evil, to reveal Himself as a resource, to make Himself known, on the one hand, and to make the moral revelation of Himself in the truth valid to the hearts of men paramount to all prejudices, on the other. If it be love, it cannot be a general law. Not that love is not the general law of God's nature, as I said; but love in exercise must have its occasion—suited occasion—be free, or it is not love. But if God acts in this world to make Himself known, He thereby works miracles; for God's acting thus is a miracle. He does not contradict, does not suspend the general law, as a law. Men die as they died before, nay, they died again if He raised them; but He acted by a power which was not subject to the general law, because He is God, takes an individual out of it by His own power, without touching the law. The queen does not abrogate a law when she pardons. That power is part of a more general law. The most general law of all is, that God is always God, cannot act contrary to Himself; but can always act as God when He pleases. Thus I know Him; His own mind, spirit, disposition, interest in man, goodness, love. I know what sin is thereby; for it is departure of will from Him. But, unless this new school deny all the truth of Christianity, their theory of general laws is wholly false. Is the resurrection by God's power or not? Does man rise of himself by some common law of his nature, or is the resurrection the fruit of the intervention of God in power? If so, the system of general laws adduced against miraculous Christianity is all nonsense. God does interfere by power, freely, to bring the great result of moral dealings to an issue. Besides, the theory of judging by general laws is false in principle. It takes man's experience of the physical course of things (for that this world is an adequate witness of God's moral government, though there is one, is a horrible lie) as the sole and absolute measure of what God is and can do. What proof is there of this? I am told it is complete. It is not; morally, it is no such thing: and your experience of what God is in the laws of the universe is no adequate measure of what God is. But, I repeat, miracles are a far more real revelation of God Himself than general laws, moral revelation. I am not personally in relationship with God by general laws. I am by free miracles, not done necessarily on me or for me, but in which God's free action shows what God personally is in His actings. I ask if Christ's miracles did not do this?—did not show the intervention of God in goodness in a world of misery? There are instances of judgment when it was to deliver others, and that is part of the character of God; permitted displays of Satan's power, that we might know it. Why are any of them inherently incredible? Who is the judge? man's experience? Nonsense! He cannot have an experience of miracles. It is merely saying there can't be because there can't be: because I do not think God ought to do them. You do not. What is incredible? was God not powerful enough to do them? You cannot say that. Was He not good enough? Ah! that is perhaps what is incredible to you. I thank God it is not for me. But, if in a world of misery, God was winning the confidence of men's hearts to His goodness, what more credible than miracles? i. e., extraordinary displays of power, sufficient to show God's intervention, so that men might know not only that evil was not of Him, but that He had come to man's help as good. That may be incredible for the new school: they may study the movements of Jupiter, and speculate on the fall of empires, as based on general laws; but a personal God of goodness they do not like to know. It has inherent incredibility for them. But there is no personal relationship with God without it. I delight in the thought of seeing God manifested here below, spending Himself to win the confidence of hearts who as offenders were afraid, and using the very wretchedness they were in by sin to draw their hearts to God out of it. True, it was inherently incredible to Pharisees and Sadducees then. He could not be of God; He did not keep the Sabbath. They were grieved that the Apostles taught the resurrection. But Jesus cared for the poor of the flock, and in spite of Pharisees, would win by speaking "as never man spake," and doing so that "it was never seen on that fashion." If power acting in goodness to win the hearts of the poor to God is inherently incredible, I know where the heart is to whom it is so. Such, then, is the place of miracles. The abiding thing is, the truth of the being of that personal objective God who is revealed by their means. Miracles are a means of knowledge as evidence. The truth, and the Son, who is the truth, revealing the Father, revealing God, is that which is evidenced.

W. Do you admit what Hippolytus says, that miracles are useless when unbelief ceases?

H. I do not in an absolute way. They are useless as evidence; but as being the fruit and exhibition of the power and love of God, they remain always the object of increased delight: and in Christ's miracles it is impossible to separate His ways, and feelings, and thoughts from them, when we have any detail. Have you not felt this?

W. Surely I have. I admit fully the justice of your remark, and it helps to judge of the nature of these signs.

H. Miracles, then, have a double character. They are confirmatory signs graciously given, and, especially Christian miracles, a present witness of the intervention of power in grace. Where Christianity is believed and professed, so far as they are proofs, they lose their importance, are out of place. So far as they have the second character, the record of them, which is here supposed to be received, is a witness to the heart that God is come in to help, and how He is come in. The Word alone reveals this directly as revelation. At any time faith founded on miracles was nothing worth, because miracles do not quicken. We are begotten by the word of truth, and so children by faith. When believed only by reason of miracles, the Lord did not trust Himself to them; He knew what was in man. As removing opposing hindrances in the mind, and strengthening man against unbelief, they are precious to our compound nature. There is much that removes unbelief, acts on our old nature, even solid reasoning does, that does not give faith nor a new nature; but removes the opposition of nature, and silences it, and attracts the heart. This if alone is nothing; there must be something positively new which a man cannot give himself, and which no proof produces.

W. You believe, then, in a really new nature and life which man receives?

H. Undoubtedly. It is a first principle, and one of the main vital questions of the day. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit. Except we are so, we cannot enter into the kingdom of God. Of His own will begat He us by the word of truth, that we might be a kind of first-fruits of His creatures. Infidelity seeks to set up man as he is, will accept Christ if he serves for that. The doctrine of Scripture is that there is a second man, a last Adam; and as is the earthly, such are they also that are earthly, and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly.

W. But miracles now have to be proved, instead of being proofs.

H. There is truth in that. We have not now to do with heathenism and Judaism (I mean in our present inquiries, for we know with delight there are missionaries to tell Christ's blessed grace to them). When we meet with infidelity now, it has the character of apostacy and antagonism. It may be open, as in the last century, or covert, as in this, but it has essentially this character. Early opposition was not apostacy; nor did it, indeed, deny the miracles; they were too recent. They ascribed them, as Celsus, to magic, or cited Apollonius Tyanneus as having wrought such too; or the Jews to magic learnt in Egypt, and the theft of the Shem hamphoresh out of the temple. Still that was antagonism, and had to be so treated. Now it is more. It is apostacy in principle, and has to be treated as such; covert I admit, using Christ's name, but only so much the worse. Christianity has been publicly admitted as the religion of God, its record accepted as the record of God, miracles and all; and then men begin to cavil, and oppose, and undermine, not being honest enough to throw it off, or sometimes happily kept back by spiritual instinct; but, as a system, it is apostacy in principle. Hence there is less hope, and the record has to be proved, objections answered, miracles to be proved, not a proof. In this case we must show their folly as reasoners, and trust to the Word, if God peradventure will give them repentance to the acknowledging of the truth. For them I should look much more to the power of the Word in grace. If the record have power in them, they will see the miracles with it, and the perfect beauty and suitableness of them in such a revelation of God. Proofs may show the absurdity of doubts, and so far are useful. They may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, but cannot give faith. Of this we have sufficiently spoken, and I suppose of general principles so delighted in by Dr. Williams. One soon sees there is not the soberness of inquiry, but delight in one like Bunsen, who, he thinks, may aid in overthrowing Scripture as a divine record. You will soon see how little they are to be trusted. I may not be able to answer every objection, but if I find a man make a hundred, and ninety-nine are shallow and foundationless, and his will pierces in it all, I am not much troubled with the weight of the hundredth. Facts and principles will both come before us.

W. Proceed.

H. We have spoken of Abraham and Egyptian dates as one great battle-horse of Bunsen and his uncritical admirers. Asia was only alluded to. I would now touch on it. It is known from Layard that Assyrian monuments have largely confirmed Scripture history. It is interesting, though of course no ground of faith. But then we are in historic periods, and it is pretty plain sailing, with difficulties in arranging names and dates incidental to ancient times and human accounts of them. I speak here of profane history, and the connection of Babylonish and Assyrian history. This is not touched on in the Review. But more ancient days are of course obscure, and here our Bunsens revel, and evoke the spirits of empires. But we will follow them there. Not to prove all with certainty,—that no man can do as to these empires with the remains we possess and the imperfect knowledge of them,—but to prove that Bunsen's admired assertions are foundationless, wholly so, and against the documents we have. "He also contends," says Dr. Williams, "that Abraham's horizon in Asia is antecedent to the first Median conquest of Babylon in 2234." Let us examine this. He puts, we have seen, Abraham's descent into Egypt in 2876: his departure from Ur, of course, many years earlier.

The question is this: the observations of the Chaldeans, according to Berosus, give 2234 for their commencement; 1903* from Alexander the Great. The length of the second dynasty is lost from the MS. The rest are there, or in modern history. From these we have 224 (lost), 458 (2nd Chaldean), 245, 526 Assyrian, and from other sources 209. Then Babylon was taken by Cyrus; that is, after 34,080 Mythic Chaldean.

We have	224	Median.
	—	Chaldean.
	458	Chaldean.
	245	Arab.
	526	Assyrian.
	209	Do. and Babylonian.

All the dynasties to Cyrus	1,662	+ lost dynasty.
	208	Persians.

All the dynasties to Alexander 1,870 + lost dynasty.

The Chaldean observations reached to 2234 before Christ, 1903 years before Alexander. The date of Callisthenes' visit being 331 before Christ, the third (second historical) dynasty must be added to complete the term. Cyrus was 538 about before Christ—1662 + 538 = 2200. If we add 258 for the dynasty missing from the MS., the first Chaldean, we have 2458 for the whole; but the first was Median, not Babylonish, if at Babylon: hence subtracting 224, 2458 — 224, we have 2234, exactly the alleged period of Babylonish astronomical observations; these Chaldeans being known observers of planetary movements in connection with their idolatry, which the Medians were not, so that it is unlikely the 2234 years of observations extend to their time. That is, the known date of Alexander, added to the alleged duration of stellar observations, agrees with the length of dynasties exactly, if we leave out the first, which was not Chaldean, and give 258 to the lost

* If we include the Median, or first historic dynasty, in the 1,903 years of observations alleged by Berossus, then the duration of the first historical Chaldean is only 34 years. But I certainly judge the other scheme preferable.

one. Some would count back from Cyrus, because the empire was then transferred from Babylon to Susa. Bunsen finds the name of Zoroaster, and connects 2234 with the first Median dynasty; but this is far less likely, as it was not religiously or historically probable. Not religiously, for the planet gazers were the Chaldeans; not historically, as, though Babylon had fallen as the imperial race in Cyrus' time, the priests' observations were given to Callisthenes at Babylon. Such is the judgment of the ablest German critics. It does not affect much our inquiry. I know Bunsen attempts to deny a Euphratean Cush; but his notion is contrary to all testimony of history, names, and accounts of races and their movements. I shall therefore take this system. It is Niebuhr's and other Germans he quotes, as well as Rawlinson's, and a German whom he quotes; quite admitting that, though the proofs are remarkably strong, in these ancient dates and readings there is uncertainty. That is, the Median, not idolatrous as the Chaldees, was the first historic kingdom. Then a Chaldean. Of this the earliest known monarch, Uruk, has left his name on the foundation of the earliest cities of Lower Babylonia, Ur (or Mogheir), Warka (probably Erech), Senkerek (Larsa), and Niffer. Here first idolatry is found—the worship of sun, moon, and planets. He calls himself king of Ur, and Kinzi Akkad; a supposed ethnical or national designation. Erech and Akkad are mentioned in Genesis. We have a known date of a king Ismidagon from an inscription of Tiglath Pileser, which places him in 1861. This is, say 340 years after Uruk.

When Babylon was founded does not appear from the monuments that I am aware of. The astronomical observations date from 2234. This, which is the date of Berosus, is not only from him, but from Callisthenes, a Greek, but probably from the same sources. Others seem to confirm it. And, 1861, or Ismidagon, being ascertained with some precision, we have bricks with the names of kings not doubted to be anterior to Ismitagon. Babylon does not appear on these. About 1750 Naramsin reigned there. Merodach Namana is the first who has been found named king of Babylon somewhat later. But we have seen the records at Babylon go to the beginning of the kingdom exactly according to the chronology adopted by the ablest inquirers, as preserved there B.C. 331.

It is evident the kings changed their capitals. Werka was probably, it is thought, Erech. Akkad we find Uruk king of. Senkereh is Larsa in the monuments; supposed to be Ellasar. I need not enter into further details here. This will give an idea of dates. Language is a difficult medium of proof, because probably Turanic or Turano-Aryan (for there are Aryan words), Hamite and Semitic terms are mixed in the vocabulary; and the cuneiform signs represent, it appears, all. Afterwards Semitic prevailed in Assyria; but the older forms being preserved apparently as sacred, what seems older is sometimes more recent. I now turn to Abraham. A king is found on the bricks of not exactly ascertained date; but very early indeed in the above dates, part of whose name is the same as Chedorlaomer's—perhaps the whole—and who is called the Ravager of the West: ravager being questionable, west certain. There are probabilities from names that he was connected with Susa or Elam, but of a Cushite race. The great Chaldean empire of Berossus begins 1976 before Christ. The first lasted from 2234 to 1976. Chedorlaomer, if the name be right, comes somewhat later; not the first king of it. Scripture Hebrew chronology puts the arrival of Abraham in Canaan about the year 1922 before Christ; 54 years after the beginning of the first idolatrous kingdom: but he had been some years in Canaan, and been down to Egypt, when Chedorlaomer arrived, so that that was perhaps ten years later—perhaps 1915 before Christ—that is, Chedorlaomer was 61 years after Berossus' date of the setting up of the second Chaldean empire. Now Abraham comes from Ur, because idolatry was there; and the dates agree with the common date given to Abraham; the cause of his being called of God existing at that time, as is demonstrated: that is, idolatry was established. Indeed, it is at this epoch, it appears, that the Semitic races spread and left Chaldea, though not all escaped the idolatry, as we see in Assyria. But the date of 2876 for Abraham given by Bunsen, with an Asiatic horizon, is in any case long before any historical data whatever. It is in the fabulous addition of 34,080 years (or 33,091 invented probably, as Bunsen himself supposes, to make up 36,000—the first lunar, the second reduced by Eusebius to solar years). Nor could it be exactly said the Medians worshipped other gods. They worshipped one under the symbol of fire. The date Bunsen gives for Abraham, to indulge his fancy as to what ought to be as to Israel, and his mistaken chronology from Manetho unverified by monuments, is about a thousand years too soon, according to all that can probably be ascertained from monuments; and these monuments show Scripture to be right. No one can pretend to precision, but all the data we have prove that Bunsen indulged his imagination. I proceed to other points, concluding with Dr. Williams that Bunsen's details on some (and nearly all) these points are sufficiently doubtful to afford ground of attack; and with all due deference, that we are most logically and rationally free to more than distrust his conclusions, instead of holding them for certain when his premisses are false, and the fruit of his imagination.

W. The character of his views seems to me pretty clear. It is simple idealism, and running a principle of his own to excess, and not sober research; merely using a mass of reading to controvert Scripture, not to ascertain the truth.

H. Simply that. I proceed. Take another instance of careful research, cited by Dr. Williams, used to prove, what I have noticed, that the slaying of the first-born was by Bedouin Arabs, most choice in the effect of their successful inroad; only it is a wonder they did not carry off, in their razzia, the first-born of cattle. Perhaps they ate them: but the proof is, that it is, as the pestilence of the Book of Kings becomes in Chronicles, the more visible angel. Now, this is a mere dream. I suppose he means Samuel, called Kings in LXX. But it is alike called a pestilence and an angel, both in Samuel and Chronicles (1 Chron. xxi. 14, 15; 2 Sam. xxiv. 15—17). In the case of Sennacherib, it is called an angel simply in Kings and Chronicles.

W. But this shows great carelessness. It is trifling.

H. Yes; trifling with truth. Never trust the alleged facts of this school. Make that a rule; I have learnt it by experience. Mark the excessive looseness of Dr. Williams in what follows: "It is no serious objection that Egyptian authorities continue the reign of Menephtah later." All these reigns in Egyptian authorities are confusion itself as to their length; but let that pass. Its objection means here no objection to Exodus xv.: "A greater difficulty is, that we find but three centuries left us from the exodus to Solomon's temple." Here the difficulty is in Bunsen's scheme. Nothing can exceed the carelessness of the article; but this very carelessness is employed to cast a slur on the chronology of the judges: "The uncertainty and popular character of which makes the difficulty (in Bunsen's scheme) of no moment." We are told the numbers in the Book of Judges proceed by the Eastern round number of 40. Now, it is possible that in the East they say—though I am not aware of it—(it is a sacred number, whatever its import,) "this forty years," as we say, "this hundred years," which may be given in round numbers, though I see no reason to think so. In the case of the wilderness and David's race, determinative details making forty years, are given. In one oppression also. But we have thirteen other oppressions or judges of precise dates. One thing that has misled most computers of the dates of Judges is, that they have not seen that Sampson and Eli are expressly during the oppression of the Philistines, and that Samuel and Saul are for a long time together. But these are details for inquiry, as every one recognizes. When it is said, "Baron Bunsen feels himself compelled to see growth in the Pentateuch, and he makes it Mosaic, as embodying the mind of Moses rather than written by his hand," one can only say it is very little matter what he makes of it. A great part of it professes to give direct communications from God. They are true or false. The style is confessedly the earliest Hebrew, as shown by the use of hu for hi, nahar for nahara. That it was edited by Ezra and others, may be very likely. That, and its being done by the great Sanhedrim in his day, is an old Jewish tradition, and may have so far general truth in it, as some such work of editing may have been called for after the return from the captivity. Josephus distinctly rests all on the authentication by the prophets, and hence owns none after Artaxerxes as Scripture. This accords with what we read in the historical parts. What Dr. Williams means by "the whole literature grew like a tree rooted in the various thoughts of successive generations," I do not know. If he means that they modified the older books continually as their habits changed, it is the most improbable, absurd idea for any nation, and particularly for the Jews, and especially with books which they disobeyed, and which reprove and reproach them, as these do, which yet they held as sacred, coming from God Himself; persecuting the prophets, too, because they spoke so plain. There cannot be conceived anything more improbable or more purely an imagination, contradicting all the facts, than this gratuitous theory. That Moses and Joshua, for certain historical events, used popular documents—as Paul Grecian poets—is stated in Scripture. That Moses may, under God's guidance, have used others which are not stated, is very possible. The question for us is, was he guided of God, so that what we have is Scripture. For that we have the authority of Christ and the apostles—which I suppose has little weight with Dr. Williams—and, I may add, the divinely given conviction of every child of God, and of every saint under the Old Testament too. All the theories of Jehovistic and Elohistic documents are the merest claptrap; we have only to examine the passages to see their fallacy. We have spoken of Gen. i. ii., and need not return to it. The history of Noah equally proves the perfect absurdity of it. I repeat, all through Scripture Jehovah is the name of relationship, as Almighty and Father are, and stated so to be. God, the simple name of the Divine being.

Again. I read here, somewhat to my astonishment, "When the fierce ritual of Syria, with the awe of a divine voice, bade Abraham slay his son, he did not reflect that he had no perfect theory of the absolute to justify him in departing from traditional revelation, but trusted that the Father, whose voice from heaven he heard at heart, was better pleased with mercy than with sacrifice; and his trust 'was his righteousness.'"

W. What!

H. You may well say what. Only, it is well to let these people talk, to show what their talking is worth. How does the good man know there was such an event? Why, from the history—and yet to please his fancied wisdom, he upsets every fact and principle of the history. Abraham had been called out from his country and traditions in the most absolute way by the "God of Glory." He was not a Syrian idolater; and never worshipped with them; but had his tent and his altar apart—that is the gist of his whole history, its essence. It has no meaning else. It was not a traditional revelation for him; he had a theory of the absolute to justify him—both at first in departing from all idolatry, and now in not returning to the ritual of Syria. God had revealed Himself to him. The Syrian ritual had no divine voice for him; and instead of finding righteousness in not sacrificing his son, when the awe of a divine voice from fierce devils bade him, the whole point of the story is that he was blessed, because he did not withhold him. So the story states. It has no other meaning; and so James reasons in his epistle, and the Hebrews quote it as his glory. They had better make popular stories for their views, a new Mormon Bible of their own, than edit such senseless stuff as this. It is a good specimen of rational literature. His comment on it is this: "So in each case we trace principles of reason and right, to which our heart perpetually responds, and our response to which is a truer sign of faith than such a deference to a supposed external authority as would quench these principles themselves." I quote this that you may remark the object which we detect throughout: the substitution of man's judgment, and what philosophers have called moral sense, for obedience to God; the putting them in contrast, so as to make a revelation needless, or an evil, because it is external. The λογος, or word, may be allowed to work in man, in man's mind; hence man, as he is, is sufficient, but no word from God allowed. It quenches the natural conscience. Now, there is a conscience; but all history declares, and every-day life confirms, that it is not competent to guide man, and that man is wicked, and naturally hates the light because he is, and is in darkness if there is no revelation. All history proves it. Now, Christianity owns this conscience, but brings God, in grace, and perfect light, into contact with it. And that is what they object to,—in a becoming spirit they tell us. But, in fact, in the passage I quote from Dr. Williams, their avowed aim is to resist a revelation of God external to man's mind, and claiming obedience. Now, it is an unhappy—I had better say happy—instance in which to make such a remark. No honest man can controvert that the whole and sole meaning of this history of Abraham is, that absolute deference to external authority was claimed, at the sacrifice of all natural affections in the case of an only son, and, what was more, in giving up all the promises lodged in his person. And this showed absolute faith in God's faithful goodness. Abraham, as the Epistle to the Hebrews tells us, was sure God must give him Isaac back, if even he raised him; for God would fulfil his promises, and fulfil them in him. When the sacrifice of self was made—for it is always self—God did not allow the sacrifice.

W. The contrast of principles between Scripture and this school, is as clear as day, and their desire to get rid of God revealing Himself—the one great blessing of our souls—in order to exalt man and his moral competency. It is war against revelation, and against obedience; for simply knowing or doing right, is not obedience. And they resist the claim of God to obedience, as well as the revelation of God in grace. This exclusion of God is dreadful, and clearly proves what they will. It is moral wickedness in character, and here shows itself in direct opposition to the mind of Scripture. The effort to give the character they wish to Scripture is contemptible—happy, I agree with you—because it shows what their state of mind, and what their reasonings are worth.

H. We will proceed to some other remarks; for, as Dr. Williams speaks of Scripture, we must meet him in detail.

“The famous Shiloh is taken in its local sense as the Sanctuary where the young Samuel was trained; which, if doctrinal perversions did not interfere, hardly any one would doubt to be the true sense.”

The sentence is this: “The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, till Shiloh come.”

What the training of the young Samuel has to do with it I cannot tell. If it refer to this, it is still a prophecy; but, I should judge, a prophecy very badly interpreted. It seems to me it is very irrational to suppose that it is a divinely inspired prophecy about the name of the place where the young Samuel was trained, because the tabernacle was there. What is “till Shiloh come”?—and yet more “to him shall the gathering of the peoples be”? What has that to do with the place the young Samuel was trained in? It is not people—fancy might have spoken of the tabernacle so—but

“peoples.” But the truth is, this use of Shiloh for the name of the place is a modern Jewish opposition to the faith of Jesus being the Messiah. All the old Jewish interpreters referred this to Messiah with one consent, though the root of the word be disputed. R. Lipmann first proposed to read it, till they come to Shiloh. As in 1 Sam. iv. 12, where the words are so translated, and this a certain Teller in the last century defended; applying it to the fact in Joshua, that at the close of the wars they pitched the tabernacle in Shiloh, and then Judah ceased to have the lead which had been given him in Numbers in the wilderness, Reuben and Gad left, &c. This interpretation has been adopted by the rationalists, as Eichorn, Ammon, Bleek, Tuch, &c., denying any application to the Messiah. The soberest and best Hebrew scholars, even rationalists, take it as referring to peace, and see Messiah in it as Prince of Peace, as the sceptre signifies dominion. They do so on Hebrew grounds, without troubling themselves about prophecy and its fulfilment. It is also translated, till he, Judah, come to rest; seeing in it the full accomplishment of the promises to Israel when the nations of the earth will be subject; some adding the coming to Shiloh, when the land was distributed as a first instalment and turning point; because Israel got its rest of promise in first provisional fulfilment there. Now, these questions of interpretation I cannot enter into here. The objections of some, as Kurz, to a personal Messiah being as yet the subject of prophecy, are null. It is said this was not within view of the faith of the patriarchs. That is a mistake; the Lord Himself says: “Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day, and he saw it and was glad.” In principle, I see nothing to object to in seeing a germinant accomplishment in responsible Israel, to be fully accomplished in their final glory with Messiah. That the chapter is a pretended prophecy after the event, has been shown to be absurd upon the face of it, for the statements are, in almost every particular, such as no one speaking from the events could have made. You must always bear in mind that these rationalists never search even whether a passage may be a prophecy. They start with the assertion, there can be none, and then seek to show how the passage may have otherwise arisen. In this case the absurdity of their notions lies on the surface. Jacob declares that he speaks of the end of days, that this goes on to the full final blessing of Israel; and the gathering of the nations is therefore the natural interpretation for those who believe in prophecy and the Divine inspiration of Scripture. That there was a provisional bringing in of blessing, and the first proposal of it on Israel's responsibility in the first coming of Christ, is the belief of all Christians, and the express teaching of Peter in Acts iii.; now put off, till Israel repent, while the Church is being gathered, and yet to be fulfilled, and then to be accomplished by a glorious intervention in the last days, I have no doubt. And Judah is preserved as a tribe (I do not see more necessarily in "Shebet") for that day. It certainly never will be fulfilled till then. It has had in the progressive development of Israel's history preparatory events. To make it Samuel's training place is simple nonsense.

It is a question whether the name be not itself given from the fact of Joshua's sitting down there to distribute the conquered land. The point difficult to receive from the words is, Israel's coming to Shiloh—either it is, "until rest come," or "until Judah come to Shiloh;" if not, the sentence is broken off, and there is no antecedent to "come." It is people, they, as the French "on," with no one mentioned before. If the ancient interpretations, Targums, &c., which all take it as Messiah, be not received, it is, "till rest come," or "till Judah come to rest." The words, "to him shall the gathering of the peoples be," is the difficulty then. If it be not translated till Shiloh come, the gathering will be to Judah, looked at as representing the people, as Judah did, and specially the stock of the house of David, and Christ, in contrast with the ten tribes. That the people first should be the vessel of God's testimony, and Messiah take their place on their failure, and gather the peoples, is the distinct declaration of prophecy. It is fully developed in Isaiah xlix., where Messiah declares he has laboured in vain, if it be Israel; and then his gathering the remnant of Israel and the nations is fully set forth, going on to the rest and glory of Israel. It is the great subject of prophecy—Messiah taking up the promise as faithful servant when Israel had failed. Hence He is the True Vine as Israel was the old vine, but was fruitless, or bore wild grapes. Bunsen's and Dr. Williams's view is too puerile to pay attention to.

The alleged "Bible before our Bible is indicated . . . rather than proved, as it might be." This merely means the old story of Jehovistic and Elohist elements, Book of Jasher, Book of the wars of the Lord, of which we have spoken. It may be seen expanded elaborately, as to the former, in De Wette, after many others, and is, I hesitate not to say, contrary to fact, and pure ignorance. Take the 6th of Genesis, indeed the whole account of the Flood, and see if any man with his senses, without a theory to support, could make two documents—one with God, the other with the Lord. Joshua also has referred to documents, to prove the truth of what he said to unbelieving enemies of Israel; so Jephthah used it against Ammon. The Kings and Chronicles constantly refer to the public records. That only says that the prophetic Spirit used but did not copy them. The statement of a Bible before the Bible has no kind of ground whatever. We are told, "he rightly rejects the perversions which make the Psalms evangelically inspired." Who ever thought they were? Why is evangelically thrust in? Who ever supposed the Psalms were the Gospel? The Psalms refer to the government of God, not to His intervention in grace, save as delivering Israel. For this their enemies must be destroyed, and this they look for. But it has nothing to do with the Christian now. He has "to do well, suffer for it, and take it patiently." The Jews in the latter day will look for their oppressing enemies to be destroyed when God comes in; and He will answer their cry. Jerome and Augustine I leave to answer for themselves; only their imagination was moderate compared with the system we are inquiring into. I admit fully the absurdity of much patristic interpretation; but calling Chaldeans demons, whose instruments they were, is not more absurd than saying: "the Father" (semitic): Japetic interpretation: the eternal will of the realization of good in man (eternal decree of election). The Son: Man, mankind (Jesus and children of God) struggling with self for the realization of good in time. 2. In an eminent degree Jesus of Nazareth as the conscious realization of God's goodness. "Man, the Son of Man:" The finite realization of the Spirit of God as good in individual consciousness developed in time. "Resurrection:" The awakening of the consciousness of this divine life in the soul. "Eternal life:" The divine element in man's ethical life as union with God's will in time.

W. But whose interpretations are these strange bewilderingments of mind?

H. Baron Bunsen's last improved.

W. Is it possible? It is well to know what kind of mind we are dealing with. I am not surprised at his idealizing history too, having his siege written before the history of it comes.

H. It was the Alexandrian manner of interpreting, and came into the Church. It is very absurd, save in so far as facts carry moral ideas in them. As to Messianic prophecies in the Old Testament: It is insisted that they refer partly to a present historical sense. This is not true of all. It is introduced here, as a great admission of the orthodox Bishops, and I know not who, as a discovery now forced on people which is to undermine these prophecies. As to the greater part of them, I do not doubt the principle at all. All Christians, since Scripture has been studied, with a very few exceptions, have so understood them; applying the principle with more or less intelligence. God in goodness, who had announced from the outset a deliverance and a deliverer, when dealing with details encouraged faith—present faith, by prophecies which had application then; but the mind of God, which saw to the end of the vista, clothed it in language which went back to the original promise, and surrounded it with clearer light. God wrought in present deliverance, and encouraged hope. The prophets acted as revealers of His mind in this, but kept alive with growing light the hope of the full deliverance yet to come; so that the prophets searched into the meaning of their own prophecies, and saw it was not for them but for us. But all this is so little new, that it is a principle laid down by Lord Bacon, who calls them germinant prophecies. Deliverance is promised as to Sennacherib, but the Holy Ghost takes occasion to point to a final deliverance from the Assyrian in the latter days. Both were important, and both given. If Paley could only find one Messianic prophecy, he was very ignorant of Scripture. I do not say that none have an inferior application to circumstances, or that the prophet does not rise from circumstances to be “rapt into future times;” but if it be meant that there is but one prophecy in which the Holy Spirit meant to point out Christ, it is utterly false. Baron Bunsen admits no prophecy, but a kind of second sight—a spirit of prognostication in man, in which he is fallible, but conceives future things. The rationalist school deny all prophecy. But take the Psalms:—the 2d psalm is prophetic of Christ; the 16th is; the 22nd is; the 69th; the 72nd; the 102nd; the 110th. I do not say that some part of some of these may not have had a partial application to other sufferers or triumphs. But they have Messiah directly in view. Many others rise up to His case while dealing in divine sympathy, more generally with the suffering remnant, whose place and part He took. But these speak directly of Him; some of Him only. For this we have the authority of Christ and the Apostles. I am aware that is nothing with this school; but it is with Christians something. They think Paul, and Peter, and the records divinely given us of Christ, on which Christianity is authentically founded, are of more authority than Dr. Williams ; for, soberly, that is the question. Can any one but a Neologist doubt that Isaiah viii. 13, to ix. 7, connects, and is meant to connect, the present circumstances of Israel with a great future deliverance by a glorious personage, who, meanwhile, is a stone of stumbling and a rock of offence? that is, encourages Israel in those days in their distress, but goes on to an alleged glorious deliverance hereafter, when the distress should be yet greater, but a deliverer there. I say alleged. I am not inquiring here whether it be false or true, whether it was a fanatic prophet, holding out hopes of false deliverance, or the Holy Ghost predicting sure events ; but I say, the prophet or impostor meant—though connecting it with present events – to encourage the people with the hopes of a glorious deliverer in future times, but who would be a stone of stumbling meanwhile, and who would have disciples. The character and terms of the prophecy prove it could not be an impostor ; they are too detailed, and speak too much of the evil of Israel. But, be the prophet what he may, I say, a man wants either sense or honesty who will attempt to deny that the alleged prophet intended to point out a mighty future deliverer, who is said to be Jehovah, long hiding His face from the house of Israel, a sanctuary or refuge, but a stone of stumbling, and then a public deliverer in battles of fire. An unbeliever may deny Christianity, and any accomplishment. If we begin by taking for granted it cannot be, we may spare ourselves the trouble of proving it is not. As a Christian, I believe a part is accomplished—the last part clearly not till Christ comes again. All I say now is, that here is a passage which, referring to Israel's fears then, and connecting the testimony with present facts, goes on through a series of alleged events to the time of a great deliverer, of the increase of whose government there will be no end, on the throne of David. Let it be a false prophecy or a true one, it is a prophecy, and a prophecy of Jehovah's being a sanctuary, a stone of stumbling, having disciples, the breaking of Israel on the stone of stumbling, to which the Lord and Peter apply this, and then a triumphant deliverer.

I will now take another character of prophecy referred to—the servant; showing that Israel is taken up as the servant, and replaced by Christ, who will deliver the remnant as again servants of Jehovah, who had long, as we have seen, hidden His face. I take this the rather as Dr. Williams has referred to it. Isa. xlii. says, “My servant whom I uphold; mine elect, in whom my soul delighteth; I have put my spirit upon Him; He shall bring forth judgment to the Gentiles. A bruised reed shall He not break,” &c. This we know is formally applied to Christ in the Gospels. In verse 19, and more distinctly and definitely in xliii. 1—10, the servant is Israel. In xlix. this is again declared in express terms, “Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified.” Then says one, If that be so I have laboured in vain, and spent my strength for nought, and in vain. And then goes on, “And now saith the Lord that formed me from the womb to be His servant, though Israel be not gathered, yet I shall be glorious in the eyes of Jehovah, and my God shall be my strength.” His judgment was with Jehovah, and his work with his God. Then comes the answer, “It is a light thing that thou shouldest be my servant, to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and restore the preserved of Israel. I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, and to be my salvation to the ends of the earth.” Yet afterwards Israel is brought back, and Zion is remembered and glorified, and kings her nursing fathers. Now here I have Israel a servant, apparently a total failure, because they are not gathered by a person who appears on the scene to do it, yet declares his work owned. Then the Gentiles brought in; a passage which Paul uses for his ministry; and then, after all, Israel restored and blessed. Now I am not saying again whether this is a false prophecy, or a true one; but it is there, was there, as a prophecy before the time, is not yet all accomplished certainly, but speaks of Israel as a servant supplanted by another who fails in gathering Israel, and turns to the Gentiles, and looks on to the end then even for Israel. It is, true or false, Messianic, predicts one who seems to fail, outwardly does as to Israel, and then turns to the Gentiles. It is used by Paul in Luke's account in the Acts, and by himself in Romans; the former to authorize his turning to the Gentiles, the latter to the Gospel time, v. 6 and v. 9. Every one can judge whether Christianity, or the ribaldry of the Neologists, and the idealism of Baron Bunsen most justly meet the statements in it. At any rate they are there. A man may reject prophecy, or say it is not fulfilled; but to say there is not avowed prophecy, and prophecy of Israel's future glory, and glory through a glorious Deliverer, commonly called Messiah, is not an honest man, or is in wilful blindness. I will take up Isa. liii. by itself as so important; but see lix. 16—21, and all lx. Now I am not arguing for their truth now, much as I believe it; I only say they exist.

W. I understand you. It is a vital point; because if they exist, which Dr. Williams attempts, but hardly dares to deny, we should soon be brought to the conviction, not that all interpreters of course are right (for, for my own part, I apprehend that when Zion and Jerusalem are turned into the church, you must make confusion, though there may be some analogies); but that God has accomplished in fact in part what He has prophesied of beforehand.

H. And remark, I insist on the truth of what they make an objection of, namely, that there is the connection with present circumstances in Israel; that God had foretold a deliverance by the seed of the woman: and then, when the world had fallen into idolatry, which no one can deny, chose out a people to preserve the knowledge of the one true God, Jehovah, and made them the centre of His earthly government: as it is said, "When the Most High (His universal name of dominion over the earth and all powers) divided to the nations their inheritance; when He separated the sons of Adam, He set the bounds of the people according to the number of the children of Israel. For the Lord's portion is His people, Jacob is the lot of His inheritance." This did not set aside the promise made before, though for a time He suffered all nations to walk in their own ways. But the promises as to the earth centred in Israel as a people. When the fulness of time was come the promised deliverer came and presented Himself to Israel as a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God. Israel is not gathered; he is a stone of stumbling. Then the promises centre, as we have seen, in Christ. Israel has voluntarily forfeited them, and ceases for a time, save by the hiding of God's face from them, to be the centre of His earthly government, and remain, as we know, without their own religion, and without a false one. Meanwhile, believers are called to follow a rejected Lord, take up their cross, and have their treasure in heaven. Though not a sparrow falls without our Father, and all is under God's hand, yet it is not the time of God's direct government in respect of an earthly people. In due time God declares He will take up the Jews and Israel again; and while the saints who have suffered will have a heavenly portion, the earth will be governed in peace. But this will be introduced by a time of evil, tribulation, and judgment. Now the prophecies all declare this, and we must not confound the government of the earth, and the promises made to the Jews and connected with it, with our heavenly hopes. God does not prophecy of heaven, but of events in the earth. These prophecies, while the Jews were connected with the present government of God, were addressed to them to warn and encourage them then; but God, knowing what they were, went on to the end, to the infallible accomplishment of His purpose, knowing that what rested on man's responsibility must fail. Hence prophecies do apply largely at the time, only they go often to the end;

and are all a part of this large general scheme—are not of private interpretation. And not only as to Messiah, but as to Jews and Gentiles, all whose history and circumstances at the close of the world's history are much more fully gone into than the circumstances of the day. Christ's humiliation is spoken of, His rejection, as we have seen; but then prophecy, as it speaks of the government of the world, once He is gone on high, passes over to His future re-appearing in the world's government: for this was the subject of prophecy. Hence Christ and the Apostles leave out often the last part of a prophecy—it belongs to the end of the present order of the world—and stop at its first coming or its effects. Thus Christ says, "To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord;" but does not add, "the day of vengeance of our God:" that is to come. So Paul, quoting the 68th Psalm, says, "He has received gifts for men;" but does not add, "Yea, even for the rebellious, that the Lord God might dwell among them." That will be true when Israel is restored in the latter day.

Take another prophecy cavilled at—Micah's prophecy; one, perhaps, as I have found, that strikes a Jew the most. Dr. Williams represents Baron Bunsen so as that, if he would quote Micah as designating Bethlehem for the birth-place of Messiah, he cannot shut his eyes to the fact that the deliverer that was to come from thence was to be a contemporary shield against the Assyrian. Why is contemporary added? Contemporary with what? Where is there a word in the passage about contemporary? This is dishonest. The fourth chapter, which precedes it, and is the same prophecy, after denouncing Jerusalem, and declaring that she shall be ploughed as a field, declares that in the last days all shall be changed, and the mountain of the Lord's house established on the tops of the mountains, and exalted above the hills; and the peoples (not people—a frequent unhappy mistake in the English version) flow unto it. And many nations shall come, and full blessings are promised to Zion in the last days after judgment. All the nations shall be gathered against her (as Zechariah prophesies also, and Isa. xvii., and other passages), but she arises and threshes them as sheaves on the corn floor. In the midst of this it is announced, not as before, chap. iii., that wickedness led to desolation, as Isaiah had, xlii. and xlvi., but that there was another great event in the interim. The judge of Israel should be insulted and rejected, and that therefore God would give them up. This judge of Israel was to be born in Bethlehem; but his goings forth have been from the days of eternity. Therefore will He give them up until she which hath travailed hath brought forth; then the remnant of his brethren will return to the children of Israel. Israel will be taken up again, and this man, this judge of Israel, will be the peace, when the Assyrian comes. Now the Assyrian is numberless times designated as the great enemy, I do not say oppressor, of the Jews, in the latter day; and the prophecy speaks explicitly of the latter day after Israel had been given up, because they had smitten the judge of Israel with a rod upon the cheek. Now "contemporary" is a dishonest word born of neology here. The prophecy I leave to any one to read through, and I would press the necessity of taking the context of passages as well as a single verse. I do not fear the result of reading the prophecy of Micah by any unprejudiced person; and the more he knows the scheme of prophecy in all the prophets, the clearer he will be, and the more he will be convinced that one Spirit wrote them. Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. If the Jews of whom the prophets speak are excluded from the interpretation by Christians, to apply it to themselves, they must distort them. If Jeremiah says, God had plucked them down, and He would build them up; and the plucking down is applied to Jews, and the building up to Christians, nonsense is made of it at once, because passages are found immediately which it is impossible so to accommodate. But if we take them as they are delivered, they are comparatively speaking perfectly simple. Yet it is into this very error this new school falls. "The typical ideas (of patience or of glory) find their culminating fulfilment in the new," says Dr. Williams.

W. But let me interrupt you with a question here. This ideal element recalls it to me. You quoted the Baron on resurrection; does he not believe in one?

H. No; as far as I can find out. "He shares," Dr. Williams tells us, "in the aspiration of the noblest philosophers elsewhere, and of the firmer believers among ourselves to (sic) a revival of conscious and individual life, in such a form of immortality as may consist with union with the Spirit of our Eternal Life-giver." It is Buddhism, and that pretty much avowedly, for he defends Buddhism from the charge of seeking annihilation. It is Philo who taught that the soul was in dualism in the body, came down from God, was a portion of Himself, and returned to be rejoined to Him. Save in Philo's respect for the Scriptures, which is only in vague language held by Bunsen, and denied in fact, all the main points of his view are, as I said, Philo's. With all its pretensions to philosophy and science, it is only a return to the doctrine of that vain but active-minded platonic Jew. Only that Bunsen necessarily brings in Christ but to reduce Him to being a mere completing the ideal system of which He is a more perfect expression. It is remarkable that Philo speaks little of Messiah, and only as an earthly king; does not connect with Him the λογος, of whom he speaks largely philosophically. I apprehend myself the whole ideal system came, as to parentage, from the Feroohers of Zoroaster, from whom Plato borrowed them, and Philo from Plato. You may find the account of Zoroaster's system in Heeren.

W. But it is the utter subversion of Christianity in all its truths.

H. What do you think Bunsen makes of the fall?

W. I know not; though I think you referred to it. All their system denies it altogether.

H. It is “ ideally the circumscription of our spirits in limits of flesh and time—then practically the selfish nature with which we fall from the likeness of God.”

W. But then the fall and creation are the same thing ; for, surely, our spirits were then circumscribed in flesh and time ; and the selfish nature is only viewed as a practical state into which we may now come when free.

H. What you say is perfectly just—the fall is simply creation ; but this is again Philo. The spirits were pure spirits, part of God, and were lowered and brought into an inferior state by coming into the body. So, indeed, Origen ; only, inconsistently, he made it partly the effect of previous conduct. This is the secret of the teaching of Origen, and Clemens of Alexandria, and of Bunsen’s liking them, as having the spirit of freedom in the Church, which was lost afterwards. But I will take up some more of the cavils against Scripture, because that is important. Forgive me if I am tedious.

W. Continue. All this examination of Scripture is full of interest.

H. Dr. Williams says, “ He cannot quote Nahum, denouncing ruin against Nineveh, or Jeremiah against Tyre, without remembering that already the Babylonish power threw its shadow across Asia, and Nebuchadnezzar was mustering his armies.” Now, all this vague language is very convenient to make mere human foresight out of divine prophecy. But there is no manly grappling with the subject. According to the best research, theological and other, Nahum lived in Hezekiah’s reign. This is drawn from reference to historical facts alluded to in the prophecy in connection with Assyria, Egypt, and Philistia, and Isaiah xx. Now, Jeremiah was more than a hundred years afterwards. In Nahum’s time Babylon did not cast its shadow over the East, and Nebuchadnezzar was not born. Mero-dach Baladan reigned in Babylon, and cherished, probably, ambitious views against Assyria, Babylon having been long a capital before Nineveh. But, though he revolted, in the confusion of Sargon's usurpation, as it appears, he was attacked and driven from Babylon into the marshes; and, though a party held to him and his family of his own race, so far was Babylon from rising then, that Esarhaddon ruled without any subject king at all in Babylon; and Assyria was under Sennacherib and Esarhaddon at a pitch of splendour it had never reached before. After that it began to decline; but it was not Nebuchadnezzar who attacked it. The last king—as to whose name there is some difficulty—sent Nabopolassar against Cyaxares, king of Media; but he joined him, married his daughter, and they attacked Nineveh together. Then, a hundred years after the prophecy, as Nahum had said, the gates of the rivers were opened. The Tigris washed away the brick defences, and the king burnt the palace over his head. Modern research has proved in detail that the fire devoured her palaces. The statement, therefore, as regards Nahum, is entirely groundless. As to Nebuchadnezzar mustering his armies, and Jeremiah knowing it; the great body of his prophecies refer, not to mustering armies, but to the war being carried on before his eyes. What was important was not that, it required no prophet, but one to put a distinct limit to the captivity of seventy years, and predict the final glory of Israel, as the prophets universally announce it, but with even more precision. That prophecy of the seventy years was distinctly fulfilled; and if Jeremiah prophesied at the mustering of the armies, and saw Jerusalem taken and burnt, his prophecy of her restoration is fulfilled prophecy. But as to dates, Dr. Williams is wrong. Jeremiah prophesies in the 14th of Josiah; that was the first year of Nabopolassar. It was not till after this that Nebuchadnezzar comes upon the scene. Marcus Niebuhr makes the 14th of Josiah some twenty years before Nebuchadnezzar's Syrian campaigns. We have still Isaiah, though briefly touched on, to notice, Psalms ii. and xxii., and Daniel. The fact is, the only real ground alleged against the authenticity of the prophets is the foregone conclusion that there can be no such thing. Dr. Williams and Bunsen only repeat what the Gesenius', and De Wettes, and Rosenmüllers—Koppe being the first—have said before them. Isaiah xiii., xiv., and xxiv. to xxvii., xxxv. to xxxvii., and xl. to the end, cannot be Isaiah's, because the captivity of Babylon is spoken of as a present thing, and the Jews' deliverance proclaimed. Consequently it must have been written at that time; that is, there can be no prophecy, therefore this is not one. But that is begging the question. "It is clear to demonstration that the later chapters are upon the stooping of Nebo and the bowing down of Babylon, when the Lord took out of the hand of Jerusalem the cup of trembling, for the glad tidings of the decree of return were heard upon the mountains." Clear to demonstration—demonstration of what? There is no need of demonstration at all. One has only to read the chapters to see they are upon the stooping of Nebo, &c. But that the decree was heard upon the mountains, intimates, it is alleged, that it was gone forth, and the people went forth not with haste. Now, all this is Dr. Williams's loose manner. If it was on the mountains, it was not in Babylon, for there are none there; and Judah was not on their mountains to hear it or have it proclaimed. Further, the going out is a promise, not a fact. But the whole point of the passage is, that, as it speaks of Nebo's stooping, Nebo must have already stooped, because no one could foretell a thing. So De Wette: The events "are supposed to have actually taken place, which shows the author wrote in the time of the Babylonish captivity." So of the earlier chapters: "The passage which treats of the destruction of Babel and the Babylonian empire, &c., must be spurious . . . because the writer takes his stand point in the exile." So Gesenius: "The oracle supposes a prophetic poet being in Babylon; and the point of time of the composition can hardly be any other . . . than when the hostility of the Medes against Babel, and their brilliant progress under Cyrus, gave to the Jews the sure hope that the seat of their persecutors would fall through them." "This situation is portrayed as present, not future, and in such a way that the ruin (of Babylon) should immediately follow. That this does not suit in the least the time of Isaiah needs no further proof." This applies specially to the last part after the history of Hezekiah, and the previous parts, which speak of Babylon, and xxiv.—xxxv. It is needless to quote more of the same kind from other rationalists. Now, it is evident that this pretends to no proof that it is not a prophecy. It assumes it, and uses the assumption to prove Isaiah could not be the author. There is no thought of proving that it is not a prophecy. As there can be none, the reference to Babylon is a proof of the time it is composed in. The allegation that it is spoken of as present, not future, is utterly without force. It speaks of things as present, which, by the supposition, were future, the destruction of Nebo and Babylon, which were only a sure hope. It pretends, that is, to be a prophecy, and of the glorious restoration of Jerusalem, when they were in exile. If, then, it be not a prophecy, it is an imposture. Indeed, the notion of a person making a prophetic book of events to encourage the people when they were present is an absurdity on the face of it. They do not want it. That an impostor may arouse hopes from his use of coming events, which throw their shadows before, is very possible; but that does not suit the argument that they relate events when they are present. But more of this when we come to Daniel, who enters into details. Only here I remark, that the theory is an absurdity. A prophet may use present interventions of God as a ground of confidence for future ones of which he prophesies; but a prophet of present events is nonsense. But this is the rationalist theory. And see how little reality there is in all this reasoning. They say Isaiah's saying that Jerusalem lay desolate, is a proof that the Jews were already exiles and Jerusalem destroyed. Yet of Nineveh it is said, she is empty, and void, and waste! But here they do not think of saying it was past. It is evident enough it is the prophetic spirit rendering it present in vision in both.

W. But why should they insist on it in Isaiah, and not in Nahum?

H. In Nahum there is no direct Messianic prophecy, and therefore they have no particular object.—they are content to leave it in the shade. Isaiah is too plain. If it be a prophecy, it is a prophecy of Christ. We have seen, indeed, that their whole statement as to Nahum is false in fact. It is equally so here; for the greater part, indeed all the prophecy, speaks of future events as the Neologists admit. Nebo had not bowed down, and Babylon had not yet fallen. The Jews were in exile then, and a very large part indeed has nothing to do with Babylon, but speaks of the coming of the Lord to judge all flesh, the future glory of Jerusalem, and the like. My part here is not to show Isaiah true, but the Neologists false. There is no ground, in fact, at all for their statements. Prophets may take an immediately imminent fact and speak of it. Thus when the people were besieged and hoped to escape, Jeremiah declares they should go to Babylon, and so they did. So Ezekiel: only he declares Zedekiah should come to Babylon, and die there, but not see it; as it happened, for they put his eyes out. But this is not the case in Isaiah. Besides, the stopping at xiv. 23 is perfectly arbitrary. The prophecy is the same at any rate to the end of xxvii. But the reason is obvious: we get then the Assyrian destroyed after Babylon, and that does not suit present things in Babylon. It is avowedly future in the text. And the destruction of the Assyrian in the future, when Israel was in Babylon, will not do if it is a prophecy. What has the founding of Zion to do with the destruction of the Philistines if we go to the end of the chapter? No: Isaiah prophesies Babylon will be destroyed: an immense event, because it was the great seat of idolatry, the empire God had first formally given to the Gentiles (the four monarchies)—that which stands as the type of man's idolatrous power in the earth oppressing God's people. Hence its judgment was in moral import all important; and the prophet looks out from it to the great closing deliverance of the earth; and adds the destruction of the Assyrian, the great external enemy that attacked God's people, not where they were captive, and never substituted for Jerusalem, as Babylon was: and then the inward enemies in their own territory, the Philistines, and Zion would be really founded of God. Hence as to Babylon, though he does prophesy its present judgment, as he had the captivity there to Hezekiah, when he was in prosperity, yet he goes on far beyond, to the day of the Lord.

The principle then is an assumption of the question which we have to prove, in order to conclude as to who the author of the book is, and has no pretension to be an argument as to anything else. And the alleged facts on which it is founded are no facts at all. Its being Isaiah or not is all one to those who believe it is inspired; although I doubt not the least it was Isaiah. Why should any one have shoved in parcels of prophecy into his? It is not merely the last twenty-five chapters, but parcels in the midst of the prophecies which are absolutely needed to make a whole of it; for they are, if we leave out Babylon and the then history of the nations which Isaiah prophetically gives, altogether incomplete. The main element, without which the rest have not their sense, is wanting. It is the main part of a whole, as any one reading it may see. And the only reason for taking it out is that it must be a prophecy if it is left in; and this avowedly. But the rest is prophecy, too, of Moab, Egypt, &c., so that nothing is gained.

I am aware that the style is alleged. But this is merely a help; and it is not denied that there are peculiarities which prove its similarity, while the general flow of the last half is naturally different from short burdens. I say, it is not denied. The explanation of these is, "But these peculiarities prove nothing."

“Their agreement in this respect cannot have been accidental, and must be explained as an imitation of the genuine, or in some other way.” One who can reason thus, De Wette, has not much title to claim attention.

W. Clearly not. It is well in these days to know what these Neologists have to say. That I find difficulties in Scripture does not surprise me. I wait, and profit by the overflowing mass of evidently divine instruction. But when learned men, or men who give themselves out for such, and have credit for great research, present it as a settled thing in Hebrew and Chaldee, and I know not what, where most people cannot follow them, that the Scriptural books are not inspired, and cannot be, it is a relief to know what ground they go on. Thus, when I find that it is simply assuming there cannot be a prophecy, and no more; and that half Isaiah is cut off solely because the chapters speak of future events, and therefore must have been then written, their whole statement crumbles to nothing. It is simply making impostors or fanatics of all the inspired writers, because inspiration is impossible. That is simply direct unbelief without any motive but the will of unbelief. And I through grace can judge for myself. I have tasted and am assured that they are inspired. Besides what you say is true, that the pretension that they were prophecies written at the time of the events, or after, is false as to the fact in the prophecies, and absurd upon the face of it.

H. As regards the alleged later words, the statement as to sagan is an absurdity. It is used in Isaiah when he is speaking of the Conqueror (Cyrus) treading down the Babylonish power; and speaks of the half governors, half kings, or deputies, satraps or pachas, who had that title in the East: and Isaiah gives them their title. It is used by Jeremiah and Ezekiel, as well as by Daniel. It would be just as much sense to say that I was not an Englishman because I spoke of the French Chambers, because in England they were called houses. As regards the alleged words of later Hebraism and Chaldaism, I have no pretensions to be learned in Hebrew certainly, but I have examined them, at least many of them; some, as the use of zaba alleged by De Wette, is, I am quite sure, a blunder. Of another, which is an Aramaism, Gesenius says, an aramaic form for the Hebrew one in a word much more common in aramean is less surprising. Others, as the use of then for if, I judge to be simply false interpretation. It has, I am satisfied, its usual Hebrew sense as the English gives it. Another, in which he follows Gesenius, alleging a Chaldaism, is entirely rejected by Rosenmüller, who gives the word as in the English as good Hebrew; and the LXX and Jerome so translate it: so Jarchi, one of the learned Rabbin. Hence I conclude, with Stuart of Andover, that the discrepancy has no solid basis of proof. The objections are wholly groundless. The best Hebraists, nay, the objector, admit that the style is not that of the later Hebrew. De Wette will have it an imitation; Rosenmüller admits that the writer, who lived near the close of the Babylonish exile, personated some ancient prophet. He admits, too, that all the latter part points to some glorious future restoration which the then restoration of Jerusalem in no way fulfilled. Only when Cyrus's decree came out he encouraged his compatriots by it. How little all this enters into the spirit of the prophet I need not say. I will enter now into some examination of the last part, and show their estimate of it to be as superficial as all the rest. I may mention that Gesenius treats it as an epistle to the Jews in exile. How then written in Babylon? They allege that the last chapters are a whole, and that the servant must be one throughout; and the 53rd chapter speaks of him. Bunsen alleges it is Jeremiah; Gesenius a personification of all the prophets.

W. But this is a deliberate denial of the authority of the apostles and New Testament, who quote the passage and apply it to Christ.

H. Do you fancy they trouble themselves about that? Not only the apostles, but the Lord, according to the evangelist, quotes their pseudo Isaiah as a prophet (John vi. 45), Paul, Peter, John, all quote Isaiah liii., and that, too, as referring to Christ. But what are apostles to neologists? They spoke according to their natural prejudices—you would not suppose the new school to have any.

W. But why do they call themselves Christians?

H. It is, I judge, in some respect a mercy. Habit, convenience, and, I trust, in many an instance, the restraint of conscience, where only the mind is led astray; but the Jewish journalist has, while exulting in their denial of Christianity, reproached them with their want of honesty. But to proceed with Isaiah. I shall show you that the servant is not the same; that the portion is not one, though the parts compose a whole; and, though Christ be seen throughout, yet that, as I said before, Israel is first presented in one part; then, in the next, Christ takes Israel's place, and then He is the Word of God to those that have ears to hear; and then the remnant, in the last days, take this place of servant. The first part ends in xlvi., with, "There is no peace, saith Jehovah, to the wicked." In this, though Christ be named, Israel is distinctly brought forward as the servant, and the question of idolatry raised, which Babylon represents, and Israel is held guilty in respect of graven images, and not heeding God's word; but in the end full deliverance and blessing is promised after full chastisement, only distinguishing the wicked and the remnant. In xlix. the second part begins; it ends in lvii., and again with, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." Now, in xl., xlvi., though in the first comforts and promises Christ be named as the servant of Jehovah after the glory of Jehovah has been insisted on, yet, when the prophet speaks of restoring Israel, and turns to their moral condition before it, they are looked at as the responsible servant of Jehovah; and His witnesses as the one only true God. "Ye are my witnesses, saith Jehovah, and my servants whom I have chosen." But Israel had been weary of Him, yet He would restore and bless them, and idolatry and Babylon would be judged. Then Israel stands forth in xlix. as the chosen witness and servant before the Gentiles. Then, in verse 4, comes the charge, not of disobedience and idolatry, but of the rejection of Christ. He is the true servant, but has laboured in vain, the true vine, the true Son, but is rejected, and Israel guilty of that. But God would infallibly make good His promises; yet Israel would be divorced: "Wherefore when I came was there no man; when I called was there none to answer?" Then we have Christ's humiliation. And now Israel itself is called upon to hear the voice of Jehovah's servant, and the lot of each depends on this (l. 11). Here they who were expressly the witnesses and servant, are called upon to hear the servant. Such and such only might count on blessing; and then restoration is gone through in a beautiful progress from the distress of the humbled remnant to the full latter-day glory of Jerusalem. Then the servant is exalted and extolled, and very high, sprinkles many nations, kings shall shut their mouths at Him; for that which they had not been told shall they see, and that which they had not heard they shall consider. Then comes the confession of the way they had received Him when He was there, and the declaration that when they esteemed Him stricken and smitten of God and afflicted, it was really an expiation work, and with His stripes they were healed. The result is blessing, but through judgment, because of not only this, but subsequent iniquity; but in the end healing—only no peace to the wicked. With this the second part closes. He then, in the third part, enters on a full controversy with Israel for their sins, and the extreme departure from God in the latter days, owned by the faithful in spirit, and then God interferes in judgment for His own name's sake, and the Redeemer comes to Zion—a passage quoted by Paul as yet to be fulfilled. This, in a certain sense, closes the part. The rest unfolds various subjects connected with the latter days. The glory and holiness of Jerusalem is depicted then in that day. Christ is introduced in a passage quoted by Himself, and, passing from His first coming in humiliation to His second in judgment. We have the confession and intercession of the prophet in Israel's name in the last days; the answer of God, how He had had patience with Israel, and used their rejection to call the Gentiles, and He will judge the sins of Israel; but—and here we find the servants again—He will make a difference between His elect servants and the wicked nation. This is enlarged upon; the rejection of mere outward service in that day is shown, and Jehovah coming in judgment, and vengeance to all flesh, is announced, but for the glory and blessing of these servants, the remnant of Israel. Thus we have Israel servant, faithless; and Christ servant, He is to be heard by the previous witnesses. Now He is rejected, and then, at the close, those who hear His voice are in the place of servants, and inherit the promises to Israel, when Jehovah comes to judge all flesh. They tell us this must be one single servant; and, if we are to believe Baron Bunsen, and what Dr. Williams recommends as a masterly analysis, all this vast scope of prophecy, from a suffering Christ to a judged world, concerns Jeremiah.

W. It is difficult indeed to conceive anything so, I was going to say, imbecile. I really know not what word to use. That would not be a seemly one I own.

H. Think of his sprinkling many nations, kings shutting their mouths at him confounded, that is, at his being so extolled and so high; the poor man that was dragged down to Egypt, and died there. For here it is the same servant; the chapters, as they insist to their own confusion, cannot be separated; the 13th verse of lii. begins the strophe, so to speak. Gesenius is not quite so absurd, he takes the whole body of prophets personified, rejected as they were by the people; and adds against De Wette and others, that whether we look at the language, or reflect on the universal expiatory sacrifices, and the habits of thought of Israel, and indeed all nations, we must see here reference to an expiatory work. But Christ and grace cannot be accepted, so perverse is the poor heart of man; the sufferings of the prophets are looked at by him as expiatory, and the means of Israel's deliverance. Anything, provided it be not Christ. He adds, that no man can doubt that the New Testament doctrine was founded on this. The poor unhappy Apostles who did not know their own religion! and all this time has elapsed, deceived by the means of their teaching, and in the 19th century light has come in. Well might not Tertullian alone, but John say, "That which was from the beginning;" and "Let that therefore abide in you which ye heard from the beginning: if that which ye have heard from the beginning abide in you, ye also shall abide in the Son and in the Father." And Paul, that we should continue in what we have learned, knowing of whom we have learned it, and that the Scriptures can make us wise unto salvation. And again, John—"He that is of God heareth us; and he that is not of God heareth not us: hereby know we the Spirit of truth and the spirit of error." I have heard the Apostles, I have heard them quoting this passage of Christ, and I know the SPIRIT OF ERROR in Dr. Williams. There is another point I would notice here. The sufferings of Christ are no doubt spoken of in Isaiah liii. The prophets were animated by the Spirit of Christ, Himself the great and perfect Prophet; and for the testimony of the word they, as He, were rejected and suffered: their report was not more received than His as the Great Prophet. So far there is a very important and interesting analogy. But that is not the chief point here. The fact is recognized, as in Ps. xxii. and Isaiah l.; but it is only the occasion here of the people's recognition of something else. "We hid our faces from Him." But what was the secret of this? "Surely He hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows," as faithful in the midst of their unfaithfulness. In a measure a prophet could say that, yea, or a Christian could say it too, in a fuller way. "Therefore I endure all things," says the Apostle "for the elect's sake." But now we come to another point. "Yet we did esteem Him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. But He was wounded for our transgressions, He was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was upon Him, and with His stripes we are healed. All we like sheep have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way; and Jehovah hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all . . . for the transgression of my people was He stricken . . . it pleased the Lord to bruise Him, He hath put Him to grief: when thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin, He shall see His seed . . . and the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand. He shall see of the travail of His soul and shall be satisfied; by His knowledge shall my righteous servant instruct many in righteousness (so I translate the hiphil here), and He shall bear their iniquities . . . because He poured out His soul unto death, and was numbered with the transgressors, and He bare the sin of many, and made intercession for the transgressors." Now none can read the chapter without seeing that, as Gesenius admits, expiatory suffering is the point insisted on, a principle of interpretation evident, from the terms of the passage, as being the point. They thought Him rejected of God as well as man; but He was really bearing their iniquities. That is the special force of the chapter, confirmed by the general conviction of the Jews on the subject of expiation, and of every nation under heaven. Now what I note this now for is that this point is (as a Christian can easily conceive) wholly omitted in the "masterly analysis." Not one word of it has Dr. Williams to produce from Bunsen, naturally enough. The pious and devoted prophet, though really representing Christ as a prophet, was far enough from pretending to be a sacrifice. But the folly of this interpretation is yet more evident, because if our Isaiah prophesied at the end of the exile, Jeremiah was dead and gone; and that which is clearly future at the end, can have no application to him. To apply it to a series of prophets is absurd; with any application to Israel as a people, the common modern Jewish idea, it is in contradiction. They are confessing their having misconceived the position of the sufferer, and that he suffered for their sins. No, nothing can be clearer than the prophecy. The servant who was to be exalted, and extolled, and very high, so that kings should shut their mouths, and he sprinkle many nations, was to be rejected by the Jews and of men; but make his soul an offering for sin, and then be highly exalted. The terms of the passage, its place in the prophecy, all give it its true and evident character, and enable us to understand why the Apostles, that is, the same Spirit that dictated it, use it (I do not exactly say found their doctrine on it, for both it and their doctrine are founded on the fact) to confirm and illustrate the doctrine of the sufferings of the blessed Saviour (compare Ps. xxi.).

W. It is as clear as can possibly be. I bless God for it. And indeed the attacks of enemies, and able enemies, such as Gesenius and De Wette, and surely of Dr. Bunsen and Dr. Williams, only prove their impotency in attempting to assail this foundation doctrine of Christianity and basis of all holy peace, that Christ is a propitiation for our sins.

H. And see the sad perversions to which it leads. "Israel," Dr. Williams tells us, "would be acknowledged, as in some sense, still a Messiah (for in spite of Baron Bunsen he prefers really the perversion of Jewish unbelief to Christianity) having borne centuries of reproach through the sins of the nations," . . . . "but the Saviour . . . . would be recognized as having eminently the unction of a prophet whose words die not, of a priest in a temple not made with hands, and of a King in the realm of thought delivering his people from a bondage of moral evil, worse than Egypt or Babylon."

Israel, then, is the Messiah who suffered for, I do not know what, through the wickedness of the Gentiles; and Christ a King in the realm of thought to deliver us from moral evil. It might be rather said, if we are to take the new school, a Saviour from the bondage of Apostolic Christianity, for that seems the greatest evil they see. "The vast majority of prophecies require some such rendering in order to Christianize them," and "our Isaiah" too. "The liii. chapter, which had been thought exceptional, is shown to harmonize with a general principle." What is meant by Christianizing the prophecies I do not know, as the prophets, they say, were only persons warning or arousing Jews by pretended prophecies (denouncing their compeers), compiled when the circumstances were present; but I take note that it is recognized that the vast majority of prophecies require some such rendering to reduce them to the measure of the new school. I believe it. The liii. is a specimen of this rendering. The Jews are Messiah in a sense, and Christ has not suffered for sins the just for the unjust. He is a Prophet, a Priest without a sacrifice, and a deliverer from moral evil as King. The Apostolic view of Christianity, the Christianity of the founders of the religion, has all to be corrected. It requires it. There is no propitiation, no sacrifice. All its great traits, as we learn it from the New Testament, are a mistake. How happy that there are some who understand a religion better than those who founded it.

I turn to the ii. Psalm. "If he would follow our version in rendering the ii. Psalm, 'kiss the Son,' he knows that Hebrew idiom convinced even Jerome the true meaning was 'worship purely.'" This statement is false. He admits nescu (I quote) means 'kiss,' and says, as kissing the hand had the sense, as in Job, of worshipping, he has given the sense, not the letter. As to 'Bar,' he acknowledges he had in his 'Commentariolis,' which are now lost, translated it 'kiss the Son,' contrary to the old Italic, which had translated it 'learn discipline.' Probably an interpretation, and which is now found in the Vulgate, which has preserved the old Italic psalms after the LXX., as the English Prayer Book the old version. Ruffinus attacked him for now giving this up, and saying, Adore purely. He replies: "Bar signifies different things,—Son, as Barjesus, &c., wheat, a handful of ears of corn, elect, and purely; what then have I sinned if I have translated a doubtful word with differing interpretations, and, having said in my notes, where there was the liberty of explanation, 'adore the Son,' in the body itself, lest I might seem a violent interpreter, and give occasion to Jewish calumnies, should have said adore purely, or in an elect way (electe), as Aquila and Symmachus have translated. How does it hurt their ecclesiastical faith if the reader should be taught in how many ways amongst the Jews one little verse can be explained." The reader will judge how far Hebrew idiom convinced even Jerome. He would not force it all one way to avoid Jewish calumnies, and so has given it several. In his own notes, when he was free, kiss the Son; in the text, adore purely. Jerome alone gives, 'kiss the Son,' in Latin, as also adore purely. The Vulgate 'learn discipline,' following the LXX., (as did the Italic or old Latin), was used in the Christian world, save in the Syriac translation, which as a kindred language, followed the Hebrew closely, and reads, kiss the Son. The Hebrew is no doubt obscure. But that the Hebrew idiom obliges to read, adore purely, is anything but just. De Wette, a first-rate Hebraist and extreme rationalist (though it seems, thank God, drawing yearly closer to Christ as he grew older, yet the freest of the free as to doctrine), in his otherwise very beautiful, though somewhat affected, translation gives, kiss the Son. Rosenmüller declares that nashak is never used by itself for adore or venerate. Hengstenberg, a Coryphæus against rationalists, translates it, kiss the Son, and quotes Gesenius, Winer, and Hitzig for the same. Venema the same, referring to the sense of elect in Bar, and gives elect son. In the main, Rosenmüller approves, quoting many others. He translates give the kiss of veneration to so great a King. Symmachus gives, purely. I am not aware of others. (Aquila, I suppose, electe.) The Septuagint translation, which is also the Chaldee, is a kind of interpretation like Rosenmüller's, and gives the sense. Jews avoided the term son, and so Neologists. Bar is more Aramæan, but Gesenius admits Hebrew tends to Aramæan in poetry. Vaihinger gives, kiss the Son. Hupfeld has it like Jerome, admitting that Gesenius, De Wette, Hengstenberg, that is, the ablest modern Hebraists, and most moderns, admit this—the Son—to be right. So much for the insinuation of Hebrew idiom convincing Jerome; and, if Hebrew idiom, it should, of course, others; whereas all the ablest Hebraists translate it, kiss the Son. I repeat, never trust the facts of Neologians.

I now turn to Psalm xxii. 17. He finds, in the most ancient Hebrew reading, "like a lion." Now that there are difficulties of interpretation or readings in Hebrew no one doubts. Christianity is in no way concerned in this phrase. It is not quoted in the New Testament. The reason for reading it as it is in the English translation is that the ancient Jews insist it is so in the old Hebrew. It is no question of rationalism. The most High Church orthodox writers take it as meaning "a lion." The form is peculiar. There is the same in Isaiah, where it is translated "as a lion;" but the ancient Jewish writers insist that it is not to be read so here. The LXX., a century and a half, say, before our Lord, translates it, "they pierced my hands and my feet"—so the Vulgate, so the Syriac in Walton; Montanus, De Wette, Hengstenberg, and many, "as a lion." Of the ancients, the Chaldee Targum only has, "as a lion;" and, according to De Rossi, the best authority, is of small authority, and founded on bad manuscripts. He insists on the manuscripts of the very learned critic of the Jews, Ben Chaiim, and the Masora, that "they pierced" is right; Rosenmüller prefers "they bound." It is a question of reading. Cahari is, "as a lion;" most probably, though not certainly, caharu is, "they pierced; and the difference in Hebrew is very slight: נִפְּרָצוּ—נִפְּרָצוּ. Caru is, "they bound." Now, as all the ancient translations give "they pierced," the Masora confirms, and one of the most critical Jewish doctors approves, pleading his own good Jewish manuscripts; and the use of the text by the fathers may have induced the Jews to tamper with the text by a change hardly perceptible; and as the pointing is uncertain, there is nothing so sure in the matter. I avow I am disposed to think "pierced" right. What is the meaning of "the assembly of the wicked surrounded me, as a lion my hands and my feet?" I do not see much sense in it. What is most against 'pierced,' though it proves nothing, is that it is never referred to in the New Testament, whereas other parts of the Psalms are. However, my own conviction is that "they pierced" is right. The difficulties and labour of those who take "as a lion" as the true reading to make any sense of it, show that it is no natural reading. Its place in the Psalm makes it inappropriate. It is not "the strength of bulls and lions" that is here spoken of—that is an earlier stage of the speaker's sorrow—but the "shamelessness of dogs." It is an interpretation of what is ascribed to the dogs. They "compass" him—so the wicked: then to jump to a lion, who does not compass people at all, is out of place. Next, how "compass his hands and feet?" what does that mean? We have had the lion, but then it was only "gaping with the mouth," and in place; here he is going on with personal details. All tends, I think, to show the ancient interpreters were right, had they cahari for caharee, or caharu. Venema reads "as a lion," but connects "my hands and my feet" with "I can count"—an additional proof of the difficulties of those who reject the ancient versions. That it is the most ancient Hebrew reading is anything but proved; that it is the common modern one is true. The versions have so far more authority in the Old Testament, that no Hebrew manuscript is so old by many centuries as the oldest of the New. In any case, though the Apostles have quoted the Psalm as a prophecy of Christ, Dr. Williams is sure they are wrong. "The staring monsters are intended by whom Israel is surrounded and torn." Only read the Psalm through; "the declaring God's name to his brethren," and "in the midst of the Church will I praise Thee;" compare this with John xx., and you will see how impossible it is to apply it to Israel. But the greatness of the scope of Divine thought, the moment Christ and redemption is the centre, these men seem incapable of. I will give you a little sketch of the Psalms preceding the xxii., which will lead us to see how specially it applies to Messiah. That the whole book of Psalms is in methodical order I cannot doubt, though we cannot enter on it now: i. gives the righteous Jew, the remnant contrasted with the wicked; the ii., Christ as King in Zion, according to the decree of God, and owned Son; the nations and rulers raging against Him, but warned; then, Christ being rejected of men, the righteous are in trial, instead of the government of God securing their present blessing, as in Psalm i. But in the viii., Christ has a wider character than in the ii. He is Son of Man, not Son of David, and all things are put under Him, and Jehovah's name is excellent in all the earth. Thus the ways of God with earth are shown. ix. and x. enter into the details of Israel's condition in the land in the last days, and their deliverance. xi.—xv. go through this, and the feelings it produces, in various ways; hence they become a comfort in any trial. xvi.: Christ first takes, in the most exquisite and deeply instructive way, His place among the excellent of the earth; shows the path of life through death; and as His trust was in Jehovah, Jehovah's presence was His joy as man. xvii. treats the subject not of confidence, but of righteousness; and here we get glory, and what I may call reward, more than joy. xviii., I have no doubt, looks at the suffering of Christ as the centre of all God's ways from Egypt to Messiah's kingdom. I now come to the Psalms I had immediately in mind. In xix. we have two testimonies of God—the creation (the heavens), and the law. In xx. the true, faithful witness is prophetically viewed as rejected by men, and in sorrows. In xxi., which directly answers to it, having cried for life, He is exalted, as man, to everlasting glory, and His hand finds out His enemies. This was outward government and dealing. He had suffered from man imagining devices against Him; and when they took the character of enemies they were judged. But (Ps. xxii.) Christ did not suffer from man only; bulls did close Him in; heartless, shameless dogs then surrounded Him, and He looked, not only to man to have compassion on Him, and there was none, not one that could watch one hour, He looked to God, and was forsaken there. But suffering from God was avenging not to be avenged; hence, when this is passed, all is grace, widening out in blessing. He declares His name to His brethren, as He did in John xx., there first distinctly calling them brethren, and leads the praises of the Church He has gathered; then brings in all Israel; then all the ends of the world remember themselves, and turn to Jehovah; and then the seed born in this time of blessing learn the great truth, to chant it with others, that He hath done this. It is evident to me there is progress in the bulls and the dogs; the first refers to mere violence, leading Him to the cross; the other to men's conduct when He was there. But the witness of creation, law, and Messiah, rejected of men, and He glorified and judging; and then His being forsaken of God, the result of which was not judgment (for it was bearing it), but grace, unmingled grace, makes the true import of the Psalm most clear. Could we dwell upon it, and study the grace of Christ in it, the place He gives us in it—what the declaring the Father's name was (see John xx.), and the full import of this consequent on redemption, and the place He then takes in our midst, when redemption is accomplished, to lead our praises as being in, and having placed us in, the same perfect joy,—it would show the extraordinary beauty of this Psalm as applied to Christ.

We may take the words of His lips upon the cross to show us he was not a stranger to it. Now, I can only use the series as marking the place Christ has in it, when God, after all, did not despise nor abhor the affliction of the afflicted, and when atonement was made for sin.

I do not believe that "I have called my son out of Egypt" is a mere accommodation. It is an example of the universal principle of the substitution of Christ the true vine, the servant, for the old vine, the servant. He began all anew as the stock for Israel, as he did for man. That the 9th of Isaiah may be translated "the father of the age to come," may be alleged. No Christian thinks of making Christ in the proper sense the Father. El Gibbor, it may be disputed, is "the strong and mighty one." Let us even suppose it is so, although it be undoubtedly contrary to the soundest criticism; one thing is certain, it is Christ then owned by the Jews after Jehovah has hid his face from them; and the law has been sealed among his disciples only, and Israel has gone through depths of misery, and, finally, the judgment by fire. Then Israel will own the child born as all this to them. It is a divinely given prophecy of Messiah. As to Isaiah vii. 16, Dr. Williams may "not listen," but his judgment will not now have much weight with a serious and critical mind. I fully believe it to be a prophecy of Christ, as Matthew has declared it. The prophecy goes on to the passage already referred to (ix. 7); and unequivocally gives all Israel's history till the time of rest and glory, including Christ's "first and second coming." The occasion of this germinant prophecy was the attack of Rezin and Pekah. But the children are symbolical children from their names: "the remnant shall return," and, "making speed to the spoil, he hasteneth the prey." So the then circumstances, in which confederacy was sought with the Assyrian, is used as a peg to hang the exhortation to look to Jehovah, and so introduce Christ's first coming, and its effects on his rejection, and thereby Israel's. Jehovah would be a stone of stumbling, and have disciples and children, and wait in this character of the faithful one in Israel on Jehovah. The safety was in Immanuel.

Now the wickedness of the house of David was the ruin of the last prop of Israel responsible to God, and thereon, as a stay to the faith of the remnant and all the promises, the virgin's seed is promised. This is said to be Hezekiah; now the application of the whole to Hezekiah only shows the utmost narrowness of spirit. It is absurd to think that all God's counsels end in a Jewish king who, after all, though blessed, wrought no great deliverance: the end of the prophecy cannot apply to him, he had no disciples, he was not the father of an age. But farther, a little critical inquiry shows it could not be Hezekiah at all. Hezekiah was twenty-five years old when he began to reign. Ahaz reigned sixteen years; consequently Hezekiah was born some eight or nine years before Ahaz began to reign; consequently there could not be a promise of his birth after Ahaz was reigning. So that the sign so solemnly given when the last hope of Israel failed in the apostacy of the house of David, for such it was in Ahaz,—the sign the Lord Himself interferes to give, calling him "God with us," means that one, no one knows who, who till then had been a virgin, should bear a son. It certainly is not Hezekiah. Is it not evident that the Spirit of God is looking out to some greater deliverer, who should indeed be Immanuel? Even the learned Jewish Rabbin, Jarchi, &c., have given up the foolish attempt to apply it to Hezekiah. Since that they and other opposers of Christianity have been at their wits' end seeking how to make out a sign out of some younger wife of Ahaz's having a son at the epoch of the prophecy. Now if you examine the prophecy, or pretended prophecy, for we are to assume nothing, you will find in symbolical and mysterious language the whole scene of Jewish history in connection with Messiah, and the state of the nation to the end when glory and deliverance comes to it. The main features are depicted in these children, one being already born, all bearing, as is usual in prophecy, and indeed in history, names indicative of the events they represent. Shear-Jashub, Immanuel, Maher-shalal-hash-baz. The remnant of Israel and its restoration, God with the people, represented by this child; and the inroad of the Assyrian, the universal expression of the enemy of the latter day. The history of the people, as we have seen, is continued from Ahaz to the glorious time of Messiah. The occasion was this:—The people despised the promises to the house of David—despised the waters of Shiloah, and trusting in human strength, cried out for a confederacy. The house of David itself, despising the promises, sought help by confederacy with the Assyrian, and removed the altar of Jehovah, putting a heathen altar in its place in the temple. In these circumstances, the Prophet, or Isaiah, giving himself for a prophet, unfolds the history of Israel. Already he owns a remnant only, which shall be restored, for he sees all ruined. He goes with Shear-Jashub to the king. The king refuses the encouragement of an offered sign from Jehovah. He was too wise a politician and lover of arts, to have faith in Jehovah. Then Immanuel is promised to Israel, born of the virgin; but the land was to be desolate. Next, the latter-day circumstances are entered on. The Assyrian comes up (prefigured by near-approaching circumstances, which are almost always, perhaps always, the occasion of latter-day predictions), but the land is Immanuel's. The Assyrian overflows all up to the head, but cannot, so to say, drown altogether; for Immanuel, God is with them. Next, the detail of the history is brought out, the people's history; the prophet is warned not to trust in confederacies, but in Jehovah the refuge of the remnant; that Jehovah, the sanctuary of those that trust in Him, would be a stumbling-stone to the mass of the people, but the law and testimony would be sealed and made good among the remnant, who are styled his disciples and his children, and are tokens to both houses of Israel that Jehovah would hide his face from the house of Israel, (all this we know has taken place), that the remnant taught by Christ would wait for Him. The result would be for the nation, and this is a second part of the inward history, a time of unparalleled distress and darkness, partially fulfilled, but not complete; a time of darkness and oppression, leading them to rage and blasphemy. But another element was in the midst of this. Light would be there when all was the shadow of death. This would be in Galilee, not in Jerusalem; the result of this would be multiplying the nation, increasing its joy, breaking men's yoke from its neck by judgment of fire (compare Isaiah lxvi.); for the mighty one, the child born to them, the Immanuel—the establisher of peace, was now owned and known by them in a kingdom never to be subverted, on the throne of David, a kingdom of peace and blessing.

Hence, Matthew, citing this prophecy, brings Jesus into Galilee, and at the close, with the true remnant, His disciples, meets them there after His resurrection, no reference being made to the ascension, linking His life and resurrection on to future Jewish hopes and despised Galilean remembrances. The ascension took place from Bethany, the secret home of Christ, when the nation rejected Him.

W. And what do the Neologists reply to this remarkable scheme or outline of Divine history, more deeply and fully known by its mysterious and symbolic character? That it gives itself for a prophecy up to the last days is clear; and the two sons of the prophet being prophetic, the third would be naturally thought so too.

H. Surely; only the prophet is in the circumstances, and with the people, and they are connected with him; but the virgin's Son is the intervention of God, God with us, and therefore not the prophets. Yet when He is seen on earth as a prophet—for so He was—He takes the prophetic place, and says, personified by the prophet, "I and the children which God hath given me." You remember the Epistle to the Hebrews quotes this as a proof of Christ's taking human nature, most rightly, as we see here. The Jews own Him, too, as a child born to them in the end, but as Immanuel withal. The 13th verse—the stone of stumbling—is also quoted by Peter and by Paul, and directly referred to, as applying to Himself, by the Lord, in view of the then state of the Jews as a nation, and predicting yet more awful consequences when He should fall upon them; for the rejected stone was to be the head of the corner. The rationalists insist, in reply, on the fathers quoting it as a proof of the prophetic virginity of Mary, and urge that, had it been so, the Hebrew would be Behula, not Alma, which does not imply necessarily that state.

W. But are you serious? Surely there must be something more.

H. There is, of course, that absolutely conclusive argument—there cannot be a prophecy.

W. Yes; but that is nonsense, because it is assuming what is to be proved, and denying all revelation at once. If God can speak, He can reveal.

H. Well, I cannot help its being nonsense; it is all they have to say. Only you may remark how they labour in vain by seeking to show what it can be. Gesenius holds it for the prophetess—wife. So Jarchi and Aben Ezra. But Gesenius admits the difficulty of calling her Ha Alma, because there was a son, Shear-jashub. So it is another wife. But then Kimchi answers, But the land is Immanuel's land. How could Isaiah call the kingdom his second wife's baby's land? and, I may add, his second wife's baby—"God with us." So he says it must be a new wife of Ahaz. But then we stumble upon Hezekiah again, because it was his land in this sense. He was a kind of figure of Christ, as son of David, before whom the Assyrian fell. But then he could not be the person alluded to here; he was born some eight or nine years before Ahaz was king, and was now some twelve or thirteen years old. Evidently the same child is the glorious one of chap. ix. But, further, Rosenmüller has shown that the argument as to alma is unfounded, and that the Scripture use of it is a virgin, and nothing else. And would it not be singular, as he adds, to call Ahaz's wife thus, and Ha Alma, the virgin? Remark, too, that not only Christians, i. e., the New Testament, distinctly apply this passage to Christ, but the effect was universal. The Jews expected a Messiah in the house of David, who would so deliver them, and have universal rule. The Gentiles, too, as Tacitus witnesses of the expectation of the whole of the East, and as Virgil has sung, wherever he found the materials of his extraordinary ode to Pollio :—

Magnus ab integro sæclorum nascitur ordo,
Jam redit et virgo redeunt Saturnia regna,
Jam nova progenies cœlo dimittitur alto
Tu modo nascenti puero quo ferrea primum
Desinit ac toto surgit gens aurea mundo Casta fave Lucina.*”

Of course, in the last phrase we find the heathen, as in the whole eclogue, the courtly poet.

It is fair to add that Rosenmüller, though a rationalist, admits fully the usual sense of the passage; adding, like a rationalist, but which is confirmatory of the Hebrew truth of the passage in Isaiah: “The fact that the expectations held out by the prophet of speedy deliverance were not fulfilled should not make us deny that the prophet thought about that. He refers to the then universal expectations of a Messianic deliverer (referred to as a hope in every deep distress), confirmed by the language of Micah, a contemporary prophet.” He admits, strange to say, that it predicted an incarnation (only as just coming) because one who was to be God with them was to be born of a virgin. He says it is evident from Matt. i. 22, 23, that the Jews at the time of Christ so interpreted it. Not believing in inspiration, they are forced to admit the facts. The statement that the word alma was not a virgin, but simply a young woman, comes from the Jews, after

Christ, attempting to reject the facts of Christianity, as may be seen in Justin's dialogue with Trypho. I say after Christ, because the LXX. give "the virgin" ἡ παρθενος ληψεται, and Aquila and Symmachus' translations made after Christianity, the first to meet the feeling of the Jews, and the effect of the argument drawn from the LXX., give νεανις, a young woman.

W. I think what you have stated proves the flippancy of their objections. If Dr. Williams will not hear, what I have heard both shows to me the wide bearing of prophetic testimony, and how it hangs together as a whole; how it connects itself with present circumstances was to be an encouragement to faith then, and a revelation to future ages—sometimes symbolical and mysterious, so as to comprise immense facts in a few words, and yet so place them in the whole scheme as to give them a plan of which Christianity is the sure, I may say necessary, interpreter. Thus Rosenmüller is so far right, that there was present encouragement; and faith met even its present reward in the ruin of Sennacherib: but, had he examined, he would have found at the same time in the hortatory language and internal history of the nation, from 12 to the end, to which you have referred, the evident ruin and rejection of Israel, in the rejection of Christ appearing as prophet, and having disciples, but not the nation, from which Jehovah hides His face.

H. It is quite just, and you will find in this part of the prophet an unfolding of all the great principles of God's dealings. After four chapters of preface, in v. the prophet (for now I shall call him so) shows the judgment of Israel for its failure in respect of its first given blessings. In vi. it is judged in respect of the coming glory of Messiah—Jehovah, but a remnant is preserved; a passage quoted in the Gospels and by Paul, as fulfilled in the blinding of the people as a people, which we know to be true (though these infidels would only make it the Gentiles' sin, and they have sinned, not the Jews), but with an answer of peace, after judgment, to the inquiry of faith counting on Jehovah's faithfulness to promise, and saying, "How long?" Then the special prophecy as to the house of David and Christ, and the remnant, and the inroad of the latter days, and the delivering judgment and glory, which we have just considered. Then he takes up their history from Rezin and Pekah to the end, or Assyrian final invasion. But this is linked to the judgment of v. by the words, "For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still;" repeated ix. 12, 21; x. 4. And as the Assyrian was the last enemy from without (from Babylon on they were captives, and the temple burnt, or under the Gentile monarchies), it is said, on the occasion of his destruction: "For yet a very little while the indignation shall cease, and His anger in their destruction" (x. 25); for he was the rod of God's anger, and the staff in his hand was God's indignation. Then (xi. and xii.) we have Messiah, and the results of His coming, the rod of the stem of Jesse. The word "indignation" becomes technical in after-prophecy for the later sorrows of the Jews, as in Daniel; and the expression in the 22nd verse, "the consumption decreed," very definitely so, for the special dealings of God in the last days.

And remark; this history of Israel, and the outward connection of Christ with the people, is never quoted in the New Testament; while the special dealings of God in connection with the revelation of Jehovah in vi., vii., viii., are largely and repeatedly quoted: a fresh confirmation how one Divine mind runs through all Scripture.

W. I enjoy your unfolding of Scripture more than your controversy, still I do not deny that it is useful and called for. Can you refer me to the texts where the expressions you call technical are used?

H. I am sure I enjoy them, at any rate, much more. I have hesitated as to whether any controversy was to be desired. But your own state of mind, though fully believing the truth of the Divine record, and of many others, where unbelief lies floating, so to speak, has made me think it might be useful. I will refer to some of the texts; but if they did not refer to the same epoch, they would not have the same force they have, which you must note. As to indignation, Daniel viii. 19; xi. 36: and as to consumption decreed, Isaiah xxviii. 22, and Daniel ix. 27. I little doubt the Lord refers to this when He speaks of the shortening of these days in Matt. xxiv.

W. I thank you; I shall examine them. They not only connect the two prophets, but, if I understand their bearing, throw light on the whole nature of this last period, so often referred to in Scripture. I think, by-the-by, this constant reference to the last days, to a special time, at the close of trial, judgments, and deliverance at the end, makes the rationalist system of application to present events, or mere Bunsenian second-sight, utterly untenable. It was in all the prophecies, from the Pentateuch on, a distinct object held out—a system of Divine government before all their minds—a system which, be it false prophecy, which would be, I think, incredible in itself, or true, at any rate proves the falseness of the rationalist view. But we have been led, I think, to Daniel.

H. I entirely agree with you. It is evidently a whole; the prophetic scheme connecting itself, of course, with present warning and circumstances, but in most various parts and divers manners, all bearing on one great delivering intervention, preceded by trials. We have the sorrows and joys of it in the Psalms, and the encouragement and warnings of it in prophets, Christ's connection with the remnant in rejection or in deliverance in both Psalms and prophets, but evidently one great moral scheme. And this is a proof of its truth, because it shows that it is not the fruit of individual mind, but of one Divine mind; for it is not copying or carrying on a scheme one from another (there is only one such case of Micah and Isaiah), nor flattering the people. They fit into a whole, but do not apply to one another. But we will turn to Daniel. The German critics in general have given him up, but we must inquire why? It is become an axiom, we are told. But German and rationalist axioms have not much hold on my mind. We will get rid of evidently false grounds of judgment to begin with. "The absence of any mention of it by the son of Sirach strikingly confirms their view of its origin"—that of a patriot bard using Daniel's name in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. Now, according to the justest criticism, all the twelve minor prophets are omitted too, though even the fact of Daniel's being in the Hagiographa would account for its not being named there as only natural. But the connection of the phrase in Greek, as to the sense, proves, I think, the introduction of the twelve minor prophets to be an interpolation, and an unskilful one. Daniel's being by the Tigris, if it proves anything, proves the genuineness of the book, as a Jew would certainly have thought of the Euphrates, the great river, not of one all but unknown and unmentioned. But it really proves nothing, because it was in the third year of Cyrus, when Daniel had left Babylon, and was at Shushan and other places. The remark of Dr. Williams, "If the scene had been Babylon under Darius, the river must have been Euphrates," has no meaning. There is question neither of Darius nor of Babylon. He cannot have simply looked at the chapter. These and similar remarks we may leave as worthless. The real objection to Daniel is, that prophecies and visions are impossible. Thus De Wette. It appears that Daniel is not the author of this book, "from its legendary contents. It is full of improbabilities." "The events of a distant future . . . are related with great distinctness and accuracy, even with the addition of the dates. This was evidently done after the events." Now it is perfectly evident that this is no argument. It is simply saying, as we have seen before, there can be no prophet, no revelation; therefore, Daniel is not one, and this is not a revelation, but composed after the event. This can have no force; it is a mere petitio principii, begging the question. But a statement is made connected with it, and repeated by all the rationalists, that the alleged prophet stops at Antiochus Epiphanes. This is simply false. He continues, after a most important reference to the state of the Jews, and a most accurate one from the time of the Maccabees, a very detailed account of the state of Palestine in connection with the kings of north and south on to the end, where Daniel was to stand in his lot at the end of days. You have only to read Daniel xi. from 30 on, and xii. to convince you of it. If their theory be true, Daniel must write the book when he stands in his lot; and the details are quite as full at the end, if not more so, than in the previous part. This is all entirely unfounded. Along with this, there is an effort to make the account of the empires suit the fact of Daniel living in Antiochus Epiphanes' time. If so, he could not speak of the Romans, and his four monarchies must end with the Grecian. Thus with Bunsen, the lion is Assyrian, the bear Babylonian, the leopard Persian, the fourth beast Alexander. Now this is too bad. Not a trace of Nineveh existed even when the true Daniel was in Babylon, and it was wholly inconsistent, if a patriot forgery, to place him there. Nineveh had not taken Judah captive; the thought is contrary to all probability; but he did see the wings of Babylon plucked, and a tame heart given it. The attempt to make the last beast Alexander—that is, the beast with seven heads and ten horns—is arbitrary, and without the smallest apparent ground. It is simply impossible that Daniel could so describe the Grecian empire, if he lived in the time of Antiochus. Alexander's empire had never seven heads and ten horns. It had four, as the leopard is spoken of here; and more precisely, as in the following, is expressly said of the Grecian kingdom, four notable horns, and out of one of them Antiochus Epiphanes, it is declared, was to come. The previous one to this is declared to be Media and Persia. All these statements are unworthy, I must say, of honest men. The previous attempt was to make

Media one empire and Persia another, and so end with Alexander. This broke down because the prophet declares he reckons them one. "The ram with two horns are the kings of Media and Persia." What was to be done? Baron Bunsen's imagination sets at work, and the Assyrian empire is dragged in before. But this is going further and faring worse. Because, besides the utter improbability already noticed, here are clearly only four great empires contemplated, and we have another figure of them—the statue, where the head of gold is Nebuchadnezzar; and we find the ten kings in another form in the ten toes. They are really to be pitied in their reasonings; their object cannot here be alleged to be truth, but at all cost to prove Daniel is no prophet—that there can be no revelation.

W. Well, it is pitiable and pitiful, because there is no honest nobleness of truth in it. No one can read Daniel, be he true or false, and not see that the Babylonish empire is the starting-point in his mind. The rest follows necessarily. Have they no other grounds?

H. The first chapter clearly shows where the starting-point of all his prophecies is, the basis of the scheme which the book carries out to the final deliverance of the Jews. But then, if this be so, he is a prophet, and all their system is false. Their anxiety betrays them. Besides chapter ix., 'Messiah is to be cut off and to have nothing,' for that is the force of it, is clearly a prophecy. How they make this apply to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes I am at a loss to understand. It was poor patriotic encouragement to tell them that their Messiah, their Prince, would be there in a year and three months, be cut off, and get nothing, and then war and desolations. And the date is the decree to restore and rebuild Jerusalem. De Wette says Daniel extends Jeremiah's seventy years to seventy weeks of years, so as to include Antiochus Epiphanes. But he admits the golden head and first beast are the Babylonian empire. Now, "include Antiochus Epiphanes" is rather vague. If we take the decree of Cyrus, which is very unlikely, it runs on to one hundred and twenty years beyond Antiochus Epiphanes, and, remark, beyond the existence of the Syrian monarchy. Cyrus took Babylon in 538. (Clinton Fynes.) The Seleucidæ ceased to reign in 65; but the 490 years end 48 years before Christ, so that they reach on to 17 years after the close of the Syrian monarchy. This is the most favourable case to De Wette. Yet it runs into the Roman power. If we take other decrees to be referred to, as surely they are, the prophecy runs on to the full-blown Roman empire. Why, then, 'to include Antiochus Epiphanes'? but you will never find details fairly examined and compared. De Wette settles it in a much more suggestive way, it was a patriot bard; like many of our own, says Dr. Williams, who borrowed Daniel's name for himself, and then being naturally afraid to speak of Antiochus Epiphanes, openly borrowed the names of Nebuchadnezzar and Belshazzar to depict him; and, as Antiochus Epiphanes, from his conduct, was called Antiochus Epimanes, or madman, bethought himself of putting Nebuchadnezzar to eat grass for seven years!

W. Dear! on what principle do they apply the kingdoms? Must not the image harmonize?

H. That is not it at all. Daniel vii. cannot go lower than Antiochus Epiphanes; for you know the bard lived then, and hence you must make the others harmonize with that.

W. But do they really settle it in that sort of way?

H. That is the exact conclusion of De Wette. Because, till the new idea of Nineveh of Baron Bunsen, all begin with Babylon, as Daniel does; but then, to make four empires down to Antiochus Epiphanes is a torture.

W. But the other proofs of the epoch of Daniel's prophesying?

H. There are Greek words used for instruments of music. As to this, De Wette himself admits that it is possible that Greek instruments with these names may have been known to the Babylonians at this time. But a fuller inquiry into, and deeper knowledge of languages, of which recent study has made almost a new science, has shown that, not only does this attempt to impeach the genuineness of Daniel, from the use of Greek words, wholly fail, but the facts go to prove the genuineness. At the utmost, too, names of instruments, which, if they came from Greece, would naturally keep their names, can be traced to Greek words. The others belong to that class of languages from which Greek proceeds—the Aryan, or Indo-European, known now through Sanscrit and Zend. These words belonged to the East, and, save one, are not found where Greek and Aramean were thrown together in the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. The foreign words are, many of them, inexplicable from Greek, but are explicable from the sacred language of the Aryans, who were the priestly caste in Babylon, and under Cyrus. As I have said, when Aramean was Hellenized, these words disappeared. The force of this is evident. It is alleged, too, that the Chaldee and Hebrew are corrupt—so says De Wette and Dr. Williams. I consult other authorities, and find the character of the Hebrew bears the closest affinity to that of Ezekiel and Habakkuk, who lived near his time; but it is less marked by peculiar corruptions than that of Ezra. The Aramean also, like that of Ezra, is also of an earlier form than exists in any other Chaldaic document. Michaelis declares that the language proves it was no late compilation. Other words betray a source which render it inexplicable how it could have been composed in Palestine. And the peculiarities urged as proofs of the late composition of Daniel are, by Havernich, on very strong grounds, shown to be Babylonish peculiarities. Thus, like the alleged Greek, they too prove the genuineness of Daniel, which they were produced to impeach. But this is not all. It was clearly received into the canon when the LXX. translation was made; so that it was then a known book. Now, the whole of this was known as complete, at the latest supposition, in 130 before Christ, as it is mentioned by Sirach—how long before cannot be said ; but it was a well-known, generally received version at that time. That is, Daniel certainly existed, was received, had been translated, not thirty years after Antiochus Epiphanes' death—not in Palestine, but in Egypt. Within thirty years after his death it had been translated, and circulated, and added to, in Egypt. Esther was translated certainly—some think only apocryphal additions and the book long before—in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. The Pentateuch is supposed to have been translated 285 or 286 years before Christ, 100 years before Antiochus, and we have a known public translation of Daniel noticed 30 years after him. Now, it is not, after all, very likely that they took 150 years to translate all ; and when I say 30 years, I speak only of when the translation is first spoken of as a whole well known. There is historical proof that the Old Testament began to be translated 110 years before Antiochus began to reign ; so that Daniel was translated probably long before the time he is made to live—certainly at latest at the time they say he lived—as a part of Scripture. Josephus treats him as the greatest of prophets.

W. The objections are evidently devoid of all weight ; and the LXX. version makes it in the last degree improbable that it can be brought down to Antiochus, even upon rationalist ground. But what do they make of the Lord's quoting it ?

H. They make nothing of it ; they do not trouble their heads about it. It is curious, if sorrowful, to see the spirit of these men. It is impossible that God can reveal anything ; and when it is inquired if it be Divine, that is out of the question. But "it suggests, in the godless invader, no slight forecast of Caligula again invading the temple with like abomination, as well as whatever exalts itself against faith and conscience to the end of the world." Thus an impostor, pretending to be a prophet of olden time, can forecast a future tyrant, make a germinant prophecy, but a true one there cannot be. That is the new school theology.

W. It is as low as it is trifling.

H. A short sketch of Daniel will facilitate our judgment of their partial interpretations. We have, first, the captive remnant, faithful and trusting Jehovah, but giving Him the name which suits Him when Jerusalem was laid low. He is the God of heaven. For the moment, his earthly place of habitation was laid low, but faith looked beyond. He was above all. Hence, in the returning intervention of God's power, the witnesses in the Apocalypse stand before the God of the earth. Next we have the Gentile powers, under which Judah was captive, presented as a whole (the man of the earth), beginning with Nebuchadnezzar. God entrusted supreme power into the hands of man; next we find that man, thus entrusted with power, sets up an idolatrous centre, and persecutes the faithful remnant. Next it is shown that the Gentile power loses its true sense, its dependent relationship to God (it is not exactly here idolatry, but great Babylon which I have built), and, during the whole time of the Gentiles, becomes a beast unintelligent. Next there is the contempt of Jehovah, the God of Israel; lastly, the setting up to be God. Thus we get a full picture of the Gentile world—not, alas! the finite realization of the spirit of goodness. This closes the outward history; what remains is made up of the visions of Daniel, in which the condition of the remnant, and the events of the last days, are more clearly brought out. It is the inside, more than the outside, as was natural—more relationships and conduct.

First we have the four great empires, but especially the last or western one, and its connection with the saints; and when the explanation comes, the final persecuting power, and the triumph of saints by the judgment and coming of the Lord, is clearly brought out. Then we get the eastern part of these empires of the beasts, and that carried down to the end, passing over from the relationship of the Syro-Grecian monarchy with the faithful Jews to the last days, thus omitting the previously given western monarchy, but expressly, and with detail, recounting what was to happen in the last end of the indignation. The ix. chapter gives the promise of the Jews' return from Babylon, and of Messiah, in answer to Daniel's supplication; but reveals that Messiah will be cut off, and not take the kingdom, and then desolations be determined on the people. x—xii. gives the history of the eastern part of the kingdom of the beasts in detail, from Cyrus and Xerxes to Antiochus Epiphanes; the coming of the Romans, describing the desolation of the Jews for many days, but then introducing the kings of north and south; but, besides them, the wilful and apostate king, and thereon the destruction of the king of the north, and the deliverance and gathering, but judgment and cleansing of Israel, for final blessing. We can see how complete a picture of the whole history of the world, in connection with the Jews, the book gives; there is nothing which has any pretence to be like it in what is uninspired. You may find pretentious details, and passions flattered, and solemn warning as to some cherished religions being neglected, but anything like the connected scope of Daniel does not exist.

H. In truth it is; and my only reply to Dr. Williams, when he says, "It is time for divines to recognize these things," is this: It is time for these servile followers of German rationalism to learn that a little attention is sufficient, for those even who are not learned, to detect their superficial flippancy, and despise—not them, God forbid!—but their dishonest dealing with serious subjects and with truth. Those who have the name of orthodox in Germany are too much afraid of them; the Tholucks and Neanders, and such like, men to be valued and respected in many points of view, have too much yielded to the current of popular professional pretensions to superiority, and have not held fast the groundwork of revelation. All earnest criticism to ascertain what God has said, to interpret it aright with every aid learning can bring, though a far less important thing than piety and the aid of God's Spirit, yet, as to the outward text, no one can object to; but no tampering with what God has said, if we recognize that He has said it. It is of the last importance, morally, for man that he have something to which he bows as God's Word; the whole condition of my soul is different then, and when I judge I am before God, and not a boy's professor. For the speaking of the inspiration of Shakespeare or Milton I have the most sovereign contempt! Can I feel my soul before God when I read them? Did Dr. Williams ever do that when he read the Word?

W. It is an immense thing to have a revelation, communications from God in this dark world. And, as you say, the whole moral condition of the soul is different when I place myself before the Word as a direct communication from God. Besides, if competent to receive and enter into it, it is the highest privilege and enjoyment, communion with God; not merely similarity of thought, but direct intercourse with Himself.

H. Surely it is. For one taught of God, the moral side of the question leaves no trace of doubt that these rationalists are without God in the matter. The Scriptures are like the cloud at the Red Sea, a cloud and darkness to them; to the simple-hearted believer it is a light all the night. I do not know that we have much more to search into in this Essay before we close our long interview. I feel how little one can bring out the deep and rich stores of Scripture in such a conversation. It is more to show the worthlessness of the pretensions of these men. The great principles of what remains we have already reviewed. The rest is merely commonplace infidelity, under the cover of indiscriminate and fulsome praise of Baron Bunsen. It is excessively badly written, turgid abstractions, without a clear idea;

“windows that exclude the light, and passages that lead to nothing.” Dr. Williams tells us that the great result of making allowance for the distinction between poetry and prose, and not overlooking the possibility of imagination’s allying itself with affection; of holding that the Bible is an expression of devout reason, and therefore to be read with reason in freedom; the holding that those who pretend to be inspired prophets are patriot bards using their name; and that these books contain no predictions, except by analogy and type, can hardly be gainsaid; that the Almighty God has been pleased to educate men and nations by employing imagination, no less than conscience, and suffering His lessons to play freely within the limits of humanity and its short-comings:—“The great result is to vindicate the work of the Eternal Spirit; that abiding influence which, as our Church teaches us in our ordination service, underlies all others, and in which converge all images of old time, and means of grace now, temple, Scripture, finger and hand of God; and, again, preaching, sacraments, waters which comfort, and flame which burns.” What does that mean?

W. Well, I really do not know. Images converging in an influence may be very fine, as well as flame which burns, but it is a strange medley of a sentence.

H. Yet the object is plain enough. All that God has given of old, all revelation, all the expressions of Divine power, are no more than the ordinary influence which the spirit of a man, as a part of the Deity, possesses. It issues in this as the true result, be it great or small. “The Bible is, before all things, the written voice of the congregation”—not of God to it. Let any one take and read it, and see if that be true. It is simply saying, that when Isaiah says, “Thus saith the Lord,” he had not the Spirit more than some other man. It was man’s, the congregation’s voice, not God’s. That when the magi said, “This is the finger of God,” they made a blunder, and need not have been so amazed; it was only the underlying influence. That when Christ said, "If I, by the finger of God, cast out devils, no doubt the kingdom of God is come among you," it is still only what Dr. Williams or you may pretend to. This, he tells us, was the earliest creed of the Church. The sacred writers acknowledge themselves men of like passions with ourselves, and we are promised illumination from the Spirit which dwelt in them. Dr. Williams, if he set about it, according to this promise, could write a bible as well as they. Now the illumination of the Spirit is promised and needed; but to confound the reception of Divine truth, by the illumination of the Spirit, with the revelation of it, is as unintelligent as it is preposterous. Paul distinguishes them carefully, so that there is no excuse for so serious a mistake. "We should define inspiration consistently with the facts of Scripture and of human nature; these would neither exclude the idea of fallibility among Israelites of old, nor teach us to quench the Spirit in true hearts for ever. But if any one prefer thinking the sacred writers passionless machines, and calling Luther and Milton uninspired, let him co-operate in researches by which his theory, if true, will be triumphantly confirmed." Then he tells us what it is he wishes, which, as far as I can see, has nothing to do with the matter, save of diligent criticism to have a pure text and translation.

I should like to see Dr. Williams write a bible; it would bring these lofty pretensions to a test. We should see what kind of bible one of these true hearts would give us. He gives us fully to understand that he is one of them. They would avoid, of course, the awkward expressions of "Thus saith the Lord." He would use the theories of Lyell or Murchison, instead of giving an account of creation as from God. He would avoid the dangerous possibility of imagination allying itself with affection in giving accounts of the blessed Lord. He would profit by "the pathway streaming with light from Eichorn to Ewald," aided "by the poetical penetration of Herden, and the philological researches of Gese-nius." We will allow him to avoid the directly predictive, and even the forecast of coming tyrannies. It is dangerous ground to tread on if you do not really know what is coming. Dr. Williams, it seems, has even the pretension to be a bard, as well as, of course, a patriot, but he may write in prose. Let us see what kind of bible he will produce. He may be freely allowed all the collaborators he wishes. I think it might be fair they should be shut up in cells like Ptolemy's translators, but we need not insist on this. They may write, not like these Essays in entire independence of each other, but with concert and comparison, or without, as they like. Let us have their bible free from all traditional methods, and see what it will be. Do they shrink from this? Why so? The influence is abiding, they should not quench it, so their church teaches them. Their God cannot be, they assure us, as of the priests of Baal, talking, or pursuing a journey, or peradventure asleep and must be awaked. They assure us they have the fire from heaven. Let us see its fruits—let us have their inspired communications. If not, in spite of all the water they may cast on it, we will own the true and blessed revelation from heaven, the true given fire; through a man, we glory in it, but not of man; the true heavenly fire, the proof that our God cares for us, and that He is the true and only God, as He has revealed Himself. We can be as calm as Elijah because we are sure, and only desire that all the people that may be misled may have their hearts turned back again; and may we fall on our faces because God has given us from Himself the true and perfect revelation of His love.

Only a few isolated passages remain which I notice, because they refer to Scripture. "The verse, 'And no man hath ascended up to heaven, save he that came down,' is intelligible as a free comment near the end of the first century, but has no meaning in our Lord's mouth at a time when the ascension had not been heard of." Now he has quoted only half the verse, it goes on—

“from heaven, the Son of man who is in heaven; and as Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness.” That is, it is clearly presented as applicable before his death, not after his ascension. What precedes makes it still more evident. “We speak that we do know and testify that we have seen, and ye receive not our witness. If I have told you of earthly things and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?” That He could do because He had come down from heaven and was divinely in it, though no man else had come down to bring word. Christ was then speaking to Nicodemus, and so speaks in the passage; it is no comment, free or unfree. The Evangelist might have added, and no one has gone up to do it like him save He who came down, the Son of man who is now there, being gone back. This would have been very intelligible as his remark, without being free at all. But it is not so. They are the Lord’s words at the time, only half of which are given by the reviewer; and their meaning is very simple and very evident. How shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things, when you cannot believe the earthly things of your own prophecies, which as a Master in Israel you ought to have understood? And if you do not believe them you must remain entirely ignorant of heavenly things, for nobody has gone up there to bring word back, but I can tell them; I came from heaven, and not only so, but I can, even in all their Divine freshness, for I am in my Divine nature always there, and it flows in my human nature to tell it according to my perfect knowledge of it.

As to faith being differently used in the Hebrews, it is a common stalking-horse of rationalists. It is not they say Paul’s Epistle, faith is used differently. No Christian is held to believe it St. Paul’s as it is not said so in the Epistle. I believe it is, but I am no way anxious or inclined to be dogmatic about it. I should be content to say with Origen, “Whose it is God knows,” only assured that it is Divine. Every one knows that very early, not two hundred years after Christ, it was doubted if it was St. Paul's when fully received as Scripture, because of the difference of style, and avowedly for this reason. But as to faith. It is differently applied, but does not mean a different thing. It is here looked at as an active principle of endurance and conduct, not as the ground on which we are justified. Both are true, that is all. A different subject is treated, and faith is shown to be the principle of blessing in both; but in both it is the reliance through grace on God's word, and so on God, which is the ground of blessing. One for peace, the other for practice.

As to second Peter, the Epistle most contested and latest known in the Church, I am thoroughly satisfied it is genuine. External evidence is not "against," but there is not so early evidence of quotation for it. That internal is, I formally deny. That mere critics who look at the surface have thought so I know. The similarity to Jude is dwelt on. There is an exactly suited difference. Jude speaks of apostacy; Peter of wickedness, because Peter speaks in both epistles of God's government, and gives the link between the glorious grace of the heaven-revealing gospel, and that government on earth as revealed already in the Old Testament. In the first epistle, viewed as exercised in favour of the just. In the second, against the wicked. Hence, he goes on to the end of all things. It professes to be the second epistle, and written by Simon Peter, saying, that he had been with Jesus in the transfiguration; and if thus an imposture, is an audacious one; yet one which is most solemn in its denunciation of evil, and holy in its character. It properly and exactly completes the first. The question of the canon I need not go into with you, nor general councils. They do not in themselves command much respect when we read their history. There was what the rationalists, however, ought to delight in, abundance of the human element. But I do not feel much more respect for the "first freedom of the gospel." What we have of the fathers here alluded to was mere Alexandrian speculation—after the school whose views are presented to us by Philo,—Neoplatonism! But we can bless God, that in spite of shameful human violence and intrigue, and the emperor's authority to keep the peace amongst the bishops of the holy councils—for that is the real truth of the case,—God, who promised that the gates of hell should not prevail against the church, has maintained substantial foundation truth for saints to live by, through the means of, or in spite of human aberrations. The early contentions of the Church, and the deplorable scenes of the first councils are full of instruction in this respect. As regards the explanation of Christian doctrines by Baron Bunsen, we have seen enough to judge of them. Dr. Williams sums them up in saying, "He may be charged with using evangelical language in a philosophical sense." I only note one point as substantially important: "Salvation would be our deliverance, not from the life-giving God, but from evil and darkness, which are His finite opposites." Now this misrepresents atonement, and misrepresents the truth; it betrays the writer. Who ever heard of salvation delivering from a life-giving God? But there is a true character of God as a moral Governor, if we are to use philosophical or "Japetic" language, which, if it were shaken, would shake the universe; which God maintains, of which judgment is the witness; and God hates sin in His people, as everywhere else, and if He comes in judgment, knows no man. He judges right. When the judgment of God went through Egypt, Israel was guilty, and righteousness could not have spared. Hence the blood was put upon the lintel and the two door-posts, and there was righteous deliverance (in a figure) from a God executing righteousness. Can Dr. Williams understand this? God in judgment, where sin is, is a condemning God, not a life-giving God. Does Dr. Williams believe that? If he does not, let him not misrepresent what Scripture does state. Now, at the Red Sea, God said, "Stand still, and see the salvation of God;" and Israel was delivered from all his enemies, and from bondage. But in virtue of what had been wrought (here all is figure, but a figure applied by Christ to Himself, and by Paul to Him) it was a righteous deliverance. The fathers did discuss what redemption was, and made utter confusion of it; but the Scripture is clear enough. Love gives the victim. The Lamb is God's Lamb; but it is a victim God gives because sin must be put away. And thus we are delivered from all we were bound by, and which kept us from God, and brought to Him in the light, according to his holiness.

Here is his doctrine of the Trinity, which I notice only to remark that its main points are wholly borrowed from Philo; for all this philosophy is only bringing us down to the reveries of an unbelieving Jew, who mixed the law with Neoplatonism. "The profoundest analysis of our world leaves the law of thought as its ultimate basis and bond of coherence." This is pure Philonism. "This thought is consubstantial with the being of the eternal I AM. Being, becoming, and animating—or substance, thinking, and conscious life, are the expressions of a triad which may be represented as will, wisdom, and love; light, radiance, and warmth, &c." Dr. Williams is very confused in what follows, or rather lower in doctrine than Bunsen; he makes wisdom the word, consciousness the spirit; but then, in order to have Christ, he says, "Consciousness or wisdom becoming personal in the Son of Man;" it is the Spirit or the Word, and becomes personal. He adds, no wonder, "If all this has a Sabellian, or almost a Brahmanical sound, its impugnors are bound, even on patristic grounds, to show how it differs from the doctrine of Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Hippolytus, Origen, and the historian Eusebius." Now Justin Martyr was deeply tinged with Platonism, and always wore his philosopher's cloak; Origen was plunged into every wildness Platonism and an extravagant imagination could plunge a person in. Eusebius was an Arian, not a Sabellian; whereas this doctrine is more Sabellian, or, as the writer justly says, almost Brahmanical—rather Bhuddist, which Philo tended to. And this is what we are to get by leaving Scripture.

The love of heathenism, formed into popery, of anythingism except a revelation, is curiously shown in a passage in this part of the review:—"The elasticity with which Christianity gathers into itself the elements of natural piety, and assimilates the relics of Gentile form and usage, can only be a ground of objection (objection to what?) with those who have reflected little on the nature of revelation." The fact is true. Mediævalism is—historical proof of it is abundant—the assimilation of the relics of heathenism. Whether it is to be objected to is another question. I should, I confess, prefer Christianity as Christ and the Apostles gave it. But the tendency of rationalism to accept popery, be assured, will daily be more evident. Pretending to be above it, it will leave it free to do all the mischief it likes. It is one of the ominous "forecasts" of the times that I have no kind of moral doubt of.

That I am not wrong in treating these rationalists as deniers of revelation—open deniers, I cannot say, but absolutely so, I can—while using Christian terms (a procedure I do not envy them their use of), some closing passages of the review will show.

"So, when he (Bunsen) asks, How long shall we bear this fiction of an external revelation? . . . . or when he says, All this is delusion for those who believe it; but what is it in the mouths of those who teach it? . . . . there will be some who think his language too vehement for good taste; others will think of burning words needed by the disease of our time." What are we to think of one who quotes this? "What is it in the mouths of those who teach it?" It is a matter of taste, and there is no disputing about that.

I have done. I fear I have tired you. I feel lassitude creeping over me in long reasonings over men's ways; in Scripture never. It is one thing that stamps its character. It renews, and feeds, and strengthens in every true exercise of mind upon it, because, though there be that exercise where the attention is fixed on it, we receive instead of judge.

W. But I am glad we have gone through it. This review is the distinctively rationalist one of the volume; our sitting has been long, but, I hope, not without profit. What I am glad of is, that it leaves the Bible what it was in my mind, and in the simple reception of that is our blessing. What I dread in these inquiries is, the loss of simplicity, the hindrance—even though I do believe it to be the revelation of God—to going to it as such, without any questions, even though answered, remaining in my mind.

H. The Lord grant that questions and answers may both disappear when you use the Scriptures. We are in another element, in the use of another faculty, when faith receives the Word. What? . . . another nature? An objection is presented to the mind; the answer is presented to it, and convinces. The Word stands higher than ever in its authority, to my mind. It is well. But when I use the word itself, my quickened soul receives it divinely, by grace; I listen to God. My mind is not at work about it; I approach it, and listen to God. Of course one's intelligence is in play, but not my mind actively judging. Now our proofs and reasonings only go to leave the soul free in its true enjoyment of these blessed divine communications, when we are taught of God. May yours be free.

W. I confess it has had another happy effect, though it may be a sorrowful thought, too—complete moral distrust of this whole class of reasoners; that is deeply engraved as the result in my mind. Have you seen the article in the “Edinburgh”?

H. I have. It is a most deplorable article; but I think we must close now. We have gone through most of the subjects of any importance, however rapidly. Perhaps Jowett's article may deserve our looking at it—it is on other ground, and somewhat more respectable than this;—if we do, we can speak of the article in the “Edinburgh.” Oh, how I bless God, in conclusion, that we have a revelation from God. A revelation from Himself, and of Himself, where love has made all easy when we are humble; where Divine depths are found, but clear, because they are divine.

W. How true it is. I am sure I join with you in thankfulness for the Word of God, however poor all our thankfulness is.

INSPIRATION AND INTERPRETATION :

A Dialogue on the Last of the Essays and Reviews.

WELL, H., what do you say to Jowett? It has a different character from the other Essays. I cannot get so fast hold of it. The others rest on alleged facts or discoveries, which may alarm you, if they can be maintained, and the deductions are just; but here there is nothing to lay hold of, and yet it leaves a painful impression on the mind that, if this be so, one has lost the Word of God. It makes me not doubt of this or that, but doubtful of everything. I think it does me more harm than the others, if I am to have faith in God's Word. I may say to myself, in reading the others, Well, this is all very well, but it rests on science or chronology, and people differ about that, and perhaps their statements will not stand examination; and there one leaves it. But here there are some sensible rules for interpretation; and yet, in interpreting, I have at the end lost the thing to be interpreted.

H. I quite agree with you; there is greater sobriety of manner, a more moderate tone; Christ seems at least to be treated with more reverence. There are many principles which I should not deny, provided other principles, which are not here, were associated with them. He circles round the outside of the word, may make some just, and more plausible remarks, to remove traditional apprehensions. These approve themselves to the mind; but when he touches the core, the substance of the word, it is simply that God is not there for him. It is infidelity as to any possessed revelation of God, and the same taking for granted that all rationalist objections are gospel, if the evangelists were not, and the same entire ignorance, really, of the heart and substance of Scripture. You must always remember that with this class of persons the love of truth does not mean that there is any truth they love, or any to be loved, but simple pyrrhonism—the keeping the mind always open to receive anything, and therefore always sure of nothing. Now, this is not the love of truth. It is the love of making people doubt, and think there is no truth. Can you tell me one truth they have brought forward in their writings? Isaiah is not Isaiah, David is not David, the inspired word is not inspired. What is it? Mere expressions of men's feelings and minds. Why, if that is all, I may get Dr. Temple's renewal of inspiration, and have or give just as good now; perhaps, as the world is got so much wiser now, better still. But we shall see that, as regards the Word of God, Mr. Jowett is just as distinctly infidel as the rest. The others are as a stone rolled upon the mountain path I have to walk on, which bars my way. I look under, see it has no foundation at all, give it a tilt, and it is down in the valley, and the path clear. Dr. Jowett is like a green morass all across. It does not look such a hindrance, but there is no safe footing anywhere. If you had been in the bogs of Ireland, you would know that a green grassy spot is sure to be unsafe. It has no bottom, and if you tread on it you are plunged in black mud. There are springs. There are springs of infidelity in Dr. Jowett. We must lay them bare, and the danger is over; they run in their own channel as infidelity, but the ground is dry. I have looked at Dr. Jowett's commentaries too. I confess I was surprised at their emptiness, and, I must say, their perverseness.

Notes, to take away the Apostle's meaning, as received by faith in the Word—not merely false interpretations, or wrong construction of Greek, or traditional notions—but all Divine points and truth gone, and that is all. They suggest to you probable or possible human circumstances which may have occasioned what is said, but deny, or, more truly, ignore all springs of eternal Divine truth as the true source of the writings. It is—though the comparison be weak—as if one should point out circumstances in the life of a man of uncommon nobleness, and energy, and truth, and generosity of character—circumstances in which his character had been developed, some of them, possibly, having as occasions done so, and attribute all to these circumstances, as if the character were caused by them. In such a case I should say of one who did so, That man does not know what the springs of truth, and nobleness, and generosity are. Circumstances may develope, he may think he is wise, but the spring is wanting in him which would enable him to understand the other, even supposing he was owned to be superior. The similarity of moral sentiment is wanting. So, when Scripture is interpreted by these men, some of their remarks as to occasions, or the effect of circumstances, may be just; but, in thinking they have explained the matter, they show they have nothing of the contents at all. As if a man should eat the hard skin of a pomegranate, and think he had tasted one, telling me that it was through that the pomegranate was ripened. Well, so it was in a sense; but he has not tasted the pomegranate for all that; nor does he know what the sun is either.

Such is the effect produced in me by Dr. Jowett's writings, though in some respects far less offensive than others of the Essays, and containing expressions as to Christ which would give hope that the love of His excellency was not wholly wanting. But there is, in all who follow this method, in point of fact, a profound ignorance of Scripture, of the text, and of its bearing and connection, and of the mind of God as stated in it.

You will ever find that what is evidently Divine and experimental, is difficult or unintelligible for them. They will satiate you with external motives and circumstances, but never study Divine truth. They turn Semitism into Japetism, with Baron Bunsen; that is, not believing the Scripture to have a Divine source, they do not study it to know what God says and thinks, but merge it into the vague notions of their own mind, and get nothing beyond what they have without it. They reduce Scripture to their minds, decently calling it their conscience, and, of course, have nothing beyond their minds save by the irresistible and unescapable power of the Word. And the plainest statements of Scripture are neglected by them, so that they cannot be trusted as to its views in a single statement they make. In virtue of their system, the knowledge of the mind of God—I do not say as a whole, for no man knows that (“we know in part”)—but in the connection of its parts, is wholly and necessarily absent; for they do not believe there is one. To one knowing simply the statements of Scripture there is an ignorance of them, and consequent misstatements as to particular passages, which is almost inconceivable. And further, with much even seemliness of manner, Dr. Jowett has the same pretensions. All have been ignorant till now the wise age of the world is come. The rationalists possess the wisdom of it. Now there is a freedom from many of these prejudices which cause glosses on Scripture; and hence—and it is the case with Dr. Jowett himself—the circumstances of Scripture become more real to them. They are looked in the face. And many who would think they must defend Christianity, carry the glosses with them to defend. These glosses are but prejudices. Over such defenders of truth, as far as reasoning goes, the rationalists have an easy victory. This, however, for myself, and I suppose for you, has lost its power. Traditions and glosses have never had much influence over me since I thought of Scripture, because it came to me as the Word of God. All the rest was man—might profit me surely—but was man as to authority. I saw that tradition, in all its shapes, was man. I can give it all up, and think it gain to have done so, have, in purpose and principle, these thirty years and more, and am delighted when any remaining influence of it is shown to me, that I may get rid of it. But I gave up traditions and glosses by and because of the power of the Word of God, and that only, and have a profound and ever-deepening conviction that it is the Word of God. I have given up glosses for that, trusting to learn humbly from that. They have given up the Word because they have found the glosses are glosses; or rather, having only the glosses, and having detected them to be such, have nothing but some old books. But the Word of God is quick and powerful, and as they have confidence in themselves, and talk a great deal about it, they come athwart that power; and their ignorance of it, the folly of their views, becomes evident for every intelligent believer, yea, for every intelligent mind where there is not a will to disbelieve. The one difficulty is, that the full unclouded truth and glory of the Word, as revealing God's mind, is known to so few (because they do live on glosses and prejudices of education), that it is difficult to make it apparent—to say nothing of one's own weakness.

I must recall to your mind, my dear W., another thing, not to be misled by words. These men use traditional words when they deny the things meant by them. I cannot say I think it an honourable system; but it is sufficient here to say we must keep it in mind. An upright mind suspects no guile, trusts the green grass, being used to see the green grass on solid ground, and finds itself, by its confidence, in the black mud. To give an instance of what I mean, we have a treatise on the interpretation of Scripture; it begins, "All Christians receive the Old and New Testament as sacred writings." Of course the unsuspecting reader supposes Mr. Jowett to present himself as a Christian with the rest, and consequently to esteem the Old and

New Testament as sacred writings. We all suppose sacred writings to be such because they are inspired,—the teaching of prophets, of Christ, and inspired apostles, or prophets, with no defined view of inspiration perhaps, but so as to receive them as having the authority of God, as God's Word.

W. Of course. Mr. Jowett's paper is on interpretation; and I do not know what sacred writings mean for a Christian, except inspired ones.

H. My poor friend, as I told you once already, you are in the childhood of the world. Here is Mr. Jowett's dictum: "Nor for any of the higher or supernatural views of inspiration is there any foundation in the gospels or epistles."

W. But surely that is not true, though each book may not come and say, I am inspired. I see that infidelity is their common object.

H. We will come to the question itself. Of course I only notice it now, that you may never, with these rationalists, take common words to mean what is commonly meant by them. They deny nothing hardly. They show that men have had all sorts of opinions, that the commonest subjects on which Christians are agreed, have been spoken of under the influence of views prevalent at the time they lived, that men were under the influence of their times (all except themselves, of course); and hence, all is uncertain, everything that has been said, doubtful. The Fathers were under the impressions of their age, the Reformers of theirs, Romanists of their system. Hence the truth itself is uncertain, because men are. Hence, doubting of every form of truth, truth itself is lost, because, everything being different, each is an opinion, a view of man. Now, men do feel the influence of their age; they are poor weak creatures. But the argument from this to the uncertainty of truth, is only a proof that they who use it have opinions, but no truth; the argument supposes God has never revealed any truth, otherwise we should say, there is a fund of absolute and sure truth. Men have varied—even those who have held it fundamentally; but, thank God, the truth remains the same. There would be an appeal from man's uncertainty to God's certainty; but they having only opinions, only man's mind, nothing from God, the effect is, that apostles and prophets, all the inspired writers, fall into the same class as these various interpreters: they underwent the influence of their day, and there is no truth at all. The only difference is, that they were at the childhood, Mr. Jowett and his friends are at the mature age of the world and human race, and the representatives of it, so that they, in the freedom it gives, judge it all. The whole matter is this, they see only the circumstances and opinions, never the truth. They have no revelation from God at all, for if we have a revelation from God, it must be truth, the truth; and when the revelation is fully made, must express His mind, though that may be partially revealed or fully, a light shining in a dark place, or the dawn of eternal day.

W. I see plainly the working of their reasonings. If there is nothing supernatural in inspiration, of course I have no truth. I may come to conclusions, but never get truth, get nothing that is a revelation of it from God, nothing that is beyond the scope of the human mind. Hence, if various opinions are shown to exist, all are doubted; all are the fruits of influence of one kind or another. I judge them all coldly, but have no opinion except the denial of inspired truth.

H. The whole system is simply that. There is the coolness which can judge what has exercised influence on others, so as to cast all they have said into doubt, all the shapes in which even real truth has been received into doubt, but no truth held at all. It is quite true that in a human mind truth is modified by circumstances in its form, for we are feeble, and hold the truth partially and mixed with error. The Christian says, yes; and what a comfort, therefore, to have the truth itself which, though taking a human form that it may apply to the human heart, and have a witness of originating where it professes to have originated, by leaving the stamp of the time and circumstances as to its form, is yet the truth of God Himself; and the channels of its communication so guarded, that I should have it pure and exactly as God meant me to have it. What a rest for my soul to have truth from God, I can rely upon it. It is pure light in the confusion of this world. It is love too which has given it to our souls wandering in the wilderness. Then comes in Mr. Jowett, and, seeing nothing of this in it at all, proves that fathers and reformers, and theologians, with systematic and conventional doctrine, are all under the influence of their age and its manner of judging, but declares that he and his friends are exempt from it; at any rate, so far exempt, that they can show in each case the influences which acted on the doctors of the various ages, and gave a form to their views; you may be allowed to doubt whether they have got the truth themselves, provided you doubt of all the rest; and when I ask, well, but about the apostles and writers of Scripture to whom these different prejudiced persons refer their doctrine? Oh! says Mr. Jowett, you must throw them all in in the lump. They are like all the rest formed by their age, and you must judge them like any other book. That is Mr. Jowett's Essay. He will tell you how fathers erred by prejudice, how reformers took the colour of their time, how modern interpreters are yet inferior. How the New Testament was formed from the influences of its day. Natural conscience will judge of all this; but of truth, Divine truth, inside of all this, revealed truth which is thus clothed or departed from, not an atom, save what nature has. He, Mr. Jowett, and his friends, have made all this clear. But, I ask, where then is the truth? You are, he tells me, to walk in the love of it. I ask, where is it to love? Oh, that is not what I mean, says Mr. Jowett. Love of truth is not truth being loved. It is not love of the truth. The truth has disappeared in the process. Love of truth merely means a readiness to reject what is not honestly what it pretends to be. Really a pretension to be able to judge by my own competency of everything, submits everything to this test, and never to be convinced, but always ready to doubt, consequently never know that anything is truth ; so that I cannot love it because it is truth. The moment I am assured anything is the truth, I can receive nothing contrary to it ; if I do, I do not love the truth. But with them the love of truth means never to do this, but readiness to doubt, because we never have the truth. This doubting, God had taken away by His word. "Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free," says Christ, "if ye continue in my word." "He that is of God heareth us," says John. To the total absence of this truth we are brought back again by the rationalists. That was all the childhood of the world ; we are now in the manhood of the world—at least sufficiently to cast off all this, and trust ourselves.

H. Well, I do not know—ourselves, and, if we please, Mr. Jowett.

W. But do you seriously mean that Mr. Jowett's essay throws Scripture thus into the lump, as you say, with other prejudiced writers, so that we have no Divine revelation, and so no standard of truth ; and that they have the singular pretension that they only are enlightened to judge of it ?

H. You shall judge of this yourself ; we will go through his essay. The only modification is, that perhaps they are only enlightened enough to learn that all before themselves have been wrong.

W. But what motive can they have ?

H. I am satisfied it is a direct work of Satan, as I said ; but it works thus :—They are enlightened, intelligent persons—at least, think themselves so ; they believe nothing, and have given up all that is Divine and supernatural in Christianity, but, as yet, like to retain the credit of being Christians ; they think that every other intelligent person must give up the faith as they have, and they seek to lower Christianity to a point in which nothing properly Divine remains, so that their intelligent friends may thus accept it. Men's eyes don't like the light, and they want to dim or destroy its character, that men may look at and receive it; only, unfortunately, it is not the light they have received, and they remain content with the state that hinders their receiving it. When any truth is in question which requires Divine faith, don't be so foolish as to peril religion on that, says Mr. Jowett; intelligent people soon won't receive it. Another truth comes up: Do not lead people to reject Christianity by defending that, he tells us.

W. But that is the love of intelligent people more than of the truth—the love of respectability. How dares he to speak of love of truth, and use such an argument?

H. It is a threat to induce people to degrade Christianity to his level of it; the poorest, simplest saint, fears no such threats; one word of Christ's is more to him than a bookful of such reasoning. It proves that the writer has not, or does not love, the truth—does not know its value; has not the moral courage that belongs, through grace, to a Divine acquaintance with it. The humblest believers pity such intelligent people, and with true charity. But what is Divine is just what is precious to such souls. They know God hides these things from the wise and prudent, and reveals them unto babes; they can therefore well understand that those who call themselves intelligent, and think highly of themselves, will stumble; those who say, We see; "we are rich, and increased in goods, and have need of nothing." Some intelligent ones (not many), the Apostle tells us, may, by grace, be poor enough in spirit to receive the kingdom of God as little children. They have been warned by their Master of such pretensions to wisdom; but God's words have been found by them, and they have eaten them, and they have been to them the joy and rejoicing of their hearts. They know they are Divine; they have received them as they are in truth—the Word of God, which works effectually in them that believe; they have not the most distant thought of being frightened out of their known treasure by the questionings of those who use human intellect to judge of Divine things. They do not think this very intelligent, because they know God. No, my dear W.; threats of the intelligent not receiving Divine truth may make us mourn, but not doubt. It was always so. They must become fools, that they may be wise. It was Celsus' reproach in his day; it is practically Mr. Jowett's in this. But we will verify what we have spoken of. That men have sought to pull Scripture their own way, as Mr. Jowett alleges, is most true; that we need not discuss. After describing how this is supposed or expected—i. e., by the cool observer—which is also true, we soon find who this observer is. "Philosophical differences are in the background, into which the difficulties about Scripture resolve themselves. They seem to run up, at last, into a difference of opinion respecting revelation itself—whether given beside the human faculties or through them; whether an interruption of the laws of nature, or their perfection and fulfilment."

Now this is rather early in the essay (the first paragraph) for infidelity to ooze out; but "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh." The essay is on the interpretation of Scripture, but it turns at last (at first, he should say) into a difference as to revelation—i. e., whether there is any. The question here is, though garbled in "philosophical differences in the background," "Is there inspiration, and are there miracles?" He could not keep it in. There is no truth in the statement whatever. With the "Ultramontane and Anglican, the Protestant and Roman Catholic, the Bible-alone-men of the Reformation school, or the Bible and Prayer-book advocates," there is no question as to the Scriptures being truly inspired, or miracles being true. They disagree on many points—on important points; but the points they do not disagree on are the inspiration and authority of the Word, and the truth of miracles. On this they all agree; their differences do not ever run up into them.

The only meaning of the sentence is, that Mr. Jowett's paper is not an interpretation, but infidelity as to the thing to be interpreted; and, as I said, he makes the doubts and differences as to interpretation fall on the truth of Scripture itself. It is poorly and dishonestly done. Others differ—he does, too, from them. It is all one thing. Now this is false. All the others, unless “The Germans,” own God's Word and its Divine character; Mr. Jowett does not. Their differences do not run up at last into this; it is not in “the background” nor in the foreground for them. They own the authority of Scripture, whatever use they make of it. It is the whole ground for Mr. Jowett; his heart was too full of it to keep it in. An honest man, unless blinded by prejudice, could not say that differences as to doctrine to be drawn from Scripture, because all held it to be Divine, run up into the denial of its authority, its inspiration, and miracles. If all is opinion, and there is no faith, then Mr. Jowett's opinion is as good, it may be, as another. But the fact is exactly the contrary of what he says. They contended fiercely, because they declared they had Divine authority for what they professed to be from Scripture, and therefore insisted that that was from God. Had it run up into doubting the Word, their conflicts would instantly have ceased. Mr. Jowett doubts of all, and hence of Scripture.

W. It is clear he must have been in a great hurry to get out his infidelity; but what he says is evidently without the smallest ground of truth in it; it is, as you said, doubting of all forms of truth, to make it doubtful whether there is anything but form. But his doubt is not a consequence of, it is exactly the opposite in principle from the discussions of the others. They did not doubt at all. All is avowedly a “difference of opinion,” even to whether there is a revelation. Truth, and the certainty of it, are gone—do not appear as a possibility.

H. The third paragraph contains the pretension to be the sole possessors of wisdom—at least, wisdom enough to doubt. "It has not been readily, or at once, that mankind have learned to realize the character of sacred writings. . . . It is the old age of the world only that has at length understood its childhood (or rather, perhaps, is beginning to understand it, and make allowance for its own deficiency of knowledge)." I told you he would let you doubt even of his world's old-age wisdom, provided you doubt of all the rest.

W. Well, it is tolerable self-sufficiency; and how opposite to the assertions of Scripture! I do not see, after all, that there is less open infidelity here than in the other papers we have examined. He seems in a hurry to get at it. Scripture speaks of perilous days at the end; it pretends everywhere to miracles, and gives itself everywhere for inspired. I cannot see the consistency of pretending to be anxious to interpret rightly a book which, if their way of setting about it be true, is an universal lie.

H. The truth of that is, that the Word, and Christianity which is revealed in it, have a power men must undergo while they seek to deny it; it has changed the world—has made the proudest hearts bow to its truth; their pride may comment on it, but they are forced to own its power.

W. However, I see plainly, that under cover of speaking of principles of interpretation, Jowett, by looking at all interpretation of Scripture as opinions formed by the day, brings in his own denial of Christianity, viewed as a miraculous revelation of God, as one of the opinions. It is not, in my opinion, brilliant in its honesty; but, perhaps, having only opinions, and no truth, he does not see any further. But then that shows that the idea of truth is lost; all is "opinionum commenta" which "delet dies."

H. I apprehend that is what is likely.

W. But there is excessive pretension in it. It reminds me of the bitter sarcasm you quoted from Job in a former conversation: "no doubt, but ye are the people, and wisdom shall die with you."

H. Many principles of interpretation—such as not taking scholastic divinity or the definitions of creeds to interpret Scripture by—I entirely agree with. God may providentially have preserved the truth, more or less, in the visible Church by them, when spirituality was gone. But Scripture does not make creeds, but livingly reveals the truth of God; all this you and I have long recognized; though, where error and Alexandrianism, or Neoplatonism, and its kindred Gnosticism, invaded the Church, creeds may have had their use. All conventional interpretations we can let go without a regret; we will take up the principles of interpretation which touch on the “philosophical differences in the background,” the difference of opinion we come to at last—i. e., Whether there is divinely given truth? A great deal that is said on confounding application and interpretation, and using Scripture to make out sermons, is very just, and, no doubt, with the preachers Mr. Jowett has to say to, necessary; but it is common-place, and needs no remark. There is an abuse of Scripture, in this respect, among ministers, in and out of the Establishment, which is a proof of a low state of mind as to Scripture and apprehension of Divine truth, which God, in His goodness, bears with, but is both painful to a mind which has studied Scripture and injurious to all. But, at least, the authority of Scripture—that is, God’s Word—is owned; it is better than Mr. Jowett’s “interpretation.” Imagination works too. Let all these remarks have their effect in the proper quarters; no sensible person will regret it. Let those who have these habits see the effect in Mr. Jowett’s treatise—that is, the charging the New Testament writers with doing the same, still being good men and Apostles; so that all the authority of Scripture is gone—mutato nomine de te fabula narratur. “What preachers do,” urges Mr. Jowett, “the Apostles and inspired writers did—accommodated Scripture to their own ideas.” But we may come to principles of interpretation which affect Scripture itself directly, as denying inspiration, or as evidently leading to the same conclusion. It is better to take up the statements in the essay than follow any order of our own on the subject. I will only, to break fairly into the subject, draw your attention to Mr. Jowett's statement, which I have already quoted, that we may know what we are about. Mr. Jowett says : " Nor for any of the higher or supernatural views of inspiration is there any foundation in the Gospels or Epistles ;" that is the " background." His other principle to which I have alluded I may quote only to set it aside. It is a base one. If inspiration be true, it is true ; if not, let us give it up. If it be, let Christianity and philosophy take care of themselves ; the day of judgment will settle who is right in principle. I do not expect—it would prove a book not inspired—a treatise on chemistry or geology, or an inspired instructor to speak any but the common language of men on this subject ; an inspired man would say the sun rises, like another. It is the grossest and flattest stupidity to object to it ; to think that the Holy Ghost, speaking to immortal souls, would stop to explain astronomy, or not use current expressions ; the whole effect of what He said would be destroyed. It is, morally speaking, impossible. He would not sanction popular errors, though He might appeal to men's belief of them as an argument of the unreasonableness of their unbelief, because then He only accepts the state of their minds, which is the truth as to their state ; but He would not use the phoenix, as Clement does, as a proof of the resurrection. That men should insist on the language of Scripture as scientific is absurd, and that is what the clergy did with Galileo, with his eppure si muove. But Mr. Jowett's principle is a hollow and base one ; speaking of chemistry and physiology, he says : " It is a false policy to set up inspiration or revelation in opposition to them—a principle which can have no influence on them, and should be rather kept out of their way." I say, if God has spoken, let God be true, and every man a liar. I make no objection to chemical and physiological inquiry ; but I do not trust man's certainty, and I do

God's. And see how far Mr. Jowett's principles go: "The sciences of geology and comparative philology are steadily gaining ground; many of the guesses of twenty years ago have become certainties, and the guesses of to-day may hereafter become so. Shall we peril religion on the possibility of their untruth? On such a cast to stake the life of man, implies not only a recklessness of facts, but a misunderstanding of the nature of the Gospel. If it is fortunate for science, it is perhaps more fortunate for Christian truth, that the admission of Galileo's discovery has for ever settled the principle of the relations between them." Now the cool, yet stupid audacity of this is somewhat singular. It amounts simply to this: the bigoted persecution of popish priests, and the judgment of the Inquisition, have exactly the same authority as the Word of God; and if the movements of Jupiter's satellites have proved the folly of popish persecution and applying their dogmas to science, the Bible must retire and hide itself before the guesses of geology, and get out of its way, as they may prove true. What think you of such a principle—of such love of truth? Is there a trace of the noble bearing of truth in it?

W. Not one.

H. There is not. I may be mistaken, of course; I may misinterpret Scripture; humility as to one's own thoughts is always right. But I have, what I believe to be the truth. I shall hold and own it as such, till I am convinced of the contrary; if I find it is not the truth I shall give it up. If what professed to be inspired, or men supposed such (for I do not think a true revelation would occupy itself with such a subject), said Jupiter's planets do not move, and it was proved they did, I might see if I had not misinterpreted, if it was not a traditional view supposed to be based on this writing; if definitively it said as a revelation, they do not, and I found they did, or had when the writing spoke of them, I would say, I have been deceived. This, at any rate, is not inspired. It is not from God. Yet, even in this case, if the direct proofs of inspiration were absolute for other parts, it would only prove this spurious. If all the writing was identified with it on the same ground, I would say, I give up holding that I have an inspired book; a book with good things in it, I may have, perhaps, from spiritual people, but no book from God with a revelation of His. I would not call them sacred writings. No man that talks of false policy in this way has a right to speak of love of truth again. I repeat, I look for no science in Scripture; I should at once be disposed to reject it as Scripture if I found it; but this I avow boldly, I have no need to use policy about it. I may avoid bringing those weak in the faith to the deciding of doubtful questions. But I am not afraid of the question of inspiration, not afraid of science. I do not apply Scripture to the latter, but I am not going to deny inspiration—that is, the direct communications of my God in grace—for the untruthful and dishonest warnings of policy from those who want to keep their religious positions and give up their religion. However, so frightened is Mr. Jowett, that his recommendation is to give up the inspiration of Scripture before a guess even of science. This guess may be true. That Scripture is, or may be, no mortal knows, certainly not Mr. Jowett, or he, from “love of truth,” would keep fast hold, and stand up for it. But Scripture, yea, even “Christian truth” itself, is all the same as the tenets of the Inquisition. Such is the man, such the doctrine, which is pretending to interpret Scripture. But as an argument, the reasoning has no ground whatever, because it assumes these Jesuitical tenets to be the absolute equivalent of what Mr. Jowett himself calls Christian truth.

We may set aside all that part of the reasoning which refers to the fears of meddling with the text. The thought lasted for perhaps a century, at the utmost, after the so-called textus receptus. Since Mills' or even Bengel's time, the question has really ceased to exist. Save a rare timid spirit, every one seeks a text critically exact. All this is throwing dust in people's eyes. Persons who have the profoundest conviction of the Divine original of Scripture, seek, for that very reason, to have it as pure as possible. The showing that people have had to give way in prejudices as to the effect of changes, has nothing to do with a denial of inspiration. In the supernatural sense, Mr. Jowett denies inspiration. It is not the way of securing our having the thing, but whether there is anything to be had which is now in question. He uses fallen prejudices to produce universal uncertainty. Having got rid of all these artifices, for such they are, I meet Mr. Jowett's statements in face on the point really in question, the inspiration of Scripture.

No one denies that the structure of sentences is to be sought, though it be not classical Greek, in the principles of the language, modified by its then state of decay, and the changes which entirely new ideas and subjects introduce necessarily into every language. But, I affirm, that the principle of Mr. Jowett, that it must be interpreted when we come to the matter contained in it, by the plain use of words as other books, is a false and absurd notion. I interpret men's words so, because men's ideas have formed them, and therefore they can express those ideas which gave them birth. But if there be a revelation, however much God may condescend to men and speak through men amongst them, and even in His Son as a man, the ideas of men not having given rise to the words and thoughts, but God, it is impossible that language formed by man's ideas can be an adequate expression of God's, if we take that language as Mr. Jowett would in its simple use according to men's ideas. Upon the showing of the case, by the strictest scientific principles, the whole statement is wrong.

W. I see it plainly. Every one who has the least inquired into the subject, or even thought of it, knows that language is formed by, and expresses the thoughts, habits, and mental objects of a people. "It is their picture. It forms itself on their habits." But if this be so, a revelation from God cannot find its adequate expression in the language taken according to its human force, because, according to its human force, it expresses human ideas, not Divine. But then this difficulty arises, we must have an inadequate revelation.

H. Inadequate, if we seek what is infinite in its completeness all at once. "We know in part and prophesy in part," says the Apostle. Intuitive knowledge of all at once is not come. But there are analogies of relationship, and the Lord Himself lays down expressly that the thought (the λογος) must be known before the speech (the ρημα) is. This is not the way with man's language. I explain the terms, and use them then to learn all relating to them, and unfold the relationships in which the things stand to one another. In Divine things we must know the thing to understand the word. To take a familiar example, "We must be born again." If I take that in the "simple universal meaning" of being born, I shall stumble with Nicodemus on nonsense. Take the word Son applied to Godhead. Has it the simple universal sense it has elsewhere? "The Word was with God, and was God." What does Word, or λογος mean? I affirm that in everything important referring to God, or even spiritual subjects, the words must have a meaning only to be known by those who have the Divine key to it, whatever that is; because as human words they only express human ideas, and they are now used to express what is not the fruit of human thought but of Divine. If I say, "Reckon yourselves to be dead unto sin;" "ye are dead, and your life is hid with Christ in God;" can I take the simple meaning of the words as they apply to the human order of thought by which they have been formed? It is absurd, and contradicts itself.

W. This seems to me perfectly clear.

H. It is not that the language is not ordinary human language. It is because it is ordinary human language (though modified, as is ever the case with new ideas), and to be construed so, that interpreting it when used for Divine things, as if the ordinary human meaning was the limit of the thought, and that is what Mr. Jowett wants, is unintelligent, yea, the grossest absurdity. And indeed Mr. Jowett cannot and does not deny it. He says, "There are difficulties of another kind in many parts of Scripture, the depth and inwardness of which require a measure of the same qualities in the interpreter himself." That is, everything that is of chief value does. And consequently he contradicts himself within a page or two expressly. "First," he says, "it may be laid down that Scripture has one meaning—the meaning which it had to the mind of the prophet or evangelist who first uttered or wrote, to the hearers or readers who first received it" (p. 378). Exactly two pages further on he says, "All that the prophet meant may not have been consciously present to his mind: there were depths which to himself also were but half revealed" (p. 380). Yet I am told (p. 378), Scripture has one meaning, the meaning which it had to the mind of the prophet.

W. It is impossible, where a man is not a hardened infidel, who will not see any force in the Word of God, to escape the conviction of special depth and power in it.

H. Another passage in which Mr. Jowett most happily contradicts himself in this respect, shows the truth of what you say. "There are germs of truth which after thousands of years have never yet taken root in the world." That is, really, that the ideas being not from a human source, but from a Divine one, human language cannot express it as a human idea, to be received according to a human measure. "There are lessons in the prophets which, however simple, mankind have not yet learned even in theory, and which the complexion of society rather tends to hide; aspects of human life in Job and Ecclesiastes, which have a truth of desolation about them which we faintly realize in ordinary circumstances." All this is saying (and makes one think Mr. Jowett above the heartless system he is propagating) that the forms into which the human mind is moulded, the state in which it naturally is, cannot seize the bearing and truth of aspect of the Divine mind, however simply it is expressed. And what follows expresses it yet more distinctly: "It is perhaps the greatest difficulty of all to enter into the meaning of the words of Christ, so gentle, so human, so Divine, neither adding to them nor marring their simplicity." Now I rejoice in such phrases. I repeat, it gives one a bright hope that Mr. Jowett is above his system, that in emancipating himself from traditional nullities, he has stumbled into the mud of the system next him, and that he will get out confessing and knowing by experience that it is dirty mud, and nothing else, and that the depth of the Divine mind and grace will be his abiding portion.

W. One would trust so indeed from these words, and they are quite the truth; but it does most entirely contradict his statement that the Scripture "has one meaning, the meaning which it had . . . . to the hearers or readers who first received it."

H. Yes; but we will rejoice in so happy an inconsistency—rejoice because the good side seems to be more truly Mr. Jowett himself. We must, however, having gladly admitted this, follow the system to which his name is attached in this paper. Now, with this depth in the mind of Christ, or even the prophets, what may be called, though unjustly, many meanings, becomes perfectly intelligible, and the necessary result. I do not take up Cocceius' notion, though I understand it, I think, that the Scripture had all the meanings it could have. It was merely awkwardly expressing in human feeling this, that the Divine mind was so large that human expressions of it partially had no end. If I draw water from the well, I do not say at each bucket, that is different water. I say, no, there is a continually springing well. It is all water of the well, but my bucket can only bring a small part of it at a time. It is, as Mr. Jowett says, hard in doing this, "not to add or mar the simplicity. The interpreter needs nothing short of fashioning in himself the image of the mind of Christ: he has to be born again into a new spiritual or intellectual world, from which the thoughts of this world are shut out." Now, that is excellent; but the proof, not that the words of Scripture are not simple, but that, from the natural mind being formed in another train of thought, it cannot enter into what is Divine. It says what Scripture says: "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit." But it denies at once the theory that Scripture can be interpreted as having the meaning it had to the hearers or readers who first received it. Scripture, Divine truth, never is really received but in the measure in which the mind is formed into the spiritual state capable of apprehending it. Not that the words are not simple, or that the statements are not. They are; but that the mind is not morally open to them; they are foolishness to it. So of the use of a passage of Scripture. As my water from the well, I may use it to drink and quench my thirst, to wash, to quench the fire, to make the plants of my garden grow. It is not changing anything in the water; God so formed it as to be properly applicable to all these things. And so His Divine Word. Man's limited nature makes limited things (we spoil the instrument in applying it to something else) and limited words. God's infinite and creative nature has, in His revelation, given what is according to His nature, though suited to man's. The source is infinite; the application to what is finite. Hence, what it is simply in itself, is various in application. Hence, even in the language which expresses it, we have a finite instrument used to express an infinite mind. This must be different from a finite instrument, used to express a finite mind. Even in the last case it is imperfect, as the comparison of the different languages shows; but, in respect of God's thoughts, though He who uses it is God, and hence it is perfectly used for thoughts not learned but only to be expressed, that which is used must have a fulness, and elasticity, and power, which it had not with man. He who would reduce the force of language used for inspired communications—as the rationalists, and, alas! inconsistent Mr. Jowett—to the measure of the mind of the speaker or hearer, denies the inspired communication altogether. Hence, too, the language of Scripture is eminently figurative. It uses physical facts and terms to express moral ideas; but the consequence is, we must have the moral ideas themselves to understand the words, as Jowett admits. But then the force of the words is measured by the ideas I have, not by the simple theory expressed by the words at all. All language is figurative when any moral subject is spoken of. I talk of a lovely picture of virtue, and so on. Our life is spent in such figures the moment I leave materialism. But man cannot speak of Divine things truly, because he does not know them; his language cannot in itself be formed directly on them, save in falsehood. When God speaks of them, and that is revelation, He does for our sakes condescend to use human language, but fills it with that which is Divine. And the intelligence of the language is in the measure of the intelligence of the truth conveyed. He who would reduce the meaning to the human meaning of the words, denies the thing altogether, makes nonsense of it besides, by making Divine things human in their conception. He is simply an infidel, in fact, that denies the communication of the Divine mind. That God should communicate His thoughts to man, to sinful, corrupt, narrow-minded man, and all be understood according to the human limit of human expressions, is an absurdity upon the face of it. It denies what it professes to admit, and this is Mr. Jowett.

H. To be sure it does. But this is a moral question under God's hand and government, like all others. Man's mind runs wild without Scripture, and it runs wild with Scripture if it trusts itself. And the mightier the instrument the more the wildness appears. If I run about with a perambulator, I may perpetrate some mischievous folly; but if with a steam-engine, I may jeopard a multitude of lives. But that is the fault of the person who does so. That this danger should not exist, we must give up materially and morally all that has power. And it is God's will that man should be thus tested. The humble mind learns according to the power of God's truth. The self-conceited wields a weapon to his own, perhaps to others' hurt; but he has not morally speaking Scripture as God's Word, but as so many thoughts, and, when wielded by man's mind, always false, because man cannot wield God. He is subject to Him, and the power He gives is subject to the moral guidance of the Spirit working in man. This is what the Apostle means by the spirits of the prophets are subject to the prophets. God may use man as an instrument, but he must first be emptied of self. Hence the humble soul prospers, has God's own Word, feeds in these green pastures, and, as the expression of what is become himself, may become a blessing to others. The self-confident mind has never approached God in His Word at all, for had he, he would have ceased to be self-confident. Whenever I see a man confident in himself (and we are all of course liable to it, at any rate in detail), I have no confidence in him. The truth is, all Divine things are a riddle, because man having departed from God, the introduction of God again is necessarily the destruction, the setting aside of man, viewed in his present state, but thereupon it is the filling the man who receives it with grace, and so with Divine confidence, and a delight in holiness that he would never have had otherwise. And he is strong in virtue of being nothing, and in the measure in which he is. As Paul says, "When I am weak then am I strong." But this is in principle, the total putting down of man as he is, and this man will not bear, and will meddle to his hurt with what is given to the new man; and God will deal morally; He will not give His power (unless as some particular exceptional exhibition to show it is Himself) otherwise than morally, certainly not at all the knowledge of Himself, and it is of that we are speaking now.

And it is right it should be so: "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." If any man will do His will, he shall know of the doctrine whether it be of God or whether I speak of myself. And is it not right that God should thus deal morally with man? Is He to give intelligence of His mind to mere human will and self-sufficiency? He presents it in the Word as adapted to man, to every one. But the understanding of its contents does depend on moral condition of soul, and ought; though it may work by grace to produce that condition. But that the rationalist denies as well as the other. I affirm, then, that as Mr. Jowett is perfectly right, his system is intellectually a contradiction and an absurdity; because it supposes a revelation of Divine thoughts of which language confessedly formed on other thoughts is the expression, and says it is to be understood according to the simple apprehension of the hearers. It is immoral, because it supposes the moral condition of men to exercise no influence in the intelligence of Divine things.

H. Undoubtedly. If He had not, it would not have tested man; being plain, it condemns him, by showing that his will and moral condition are in question—are the real hindrance. Light was surely in the world. Nothing so simple as light. But men loved darkness rather than light. The Lord therefore came not to judge, but in judgment; not only is light, but gives eyes to one born blind; that they which see not might see, and they which see might be made blind. And so it is now. How can ye believe who receive honour one of another? He sowed the seed in the heart. Often it was by the wayside, hard as the nether millstone—the highway of this world's folly and self-will;—part was choked by cares, riches, and lusts; part lost by self-deception. Hence, too, we have what stupid, most stupid rationalists would call contradiction. He spoke to them in parables as they were able to bear it. Yet

He spoke to them in parables, that, hearing, they might hear and not perceive. It was perfectly suited to them in grace; but, to a nation that would not the truth, so communicated, that, where the prejudice of will was, all should be dark. Those who had judged themselves, who had repented, believed and glorified Him. The Pharisees rejected the counsel of God against themselves, being not baptized of John. I will now cite the positive testimony of the Lord to this principle of having the Divine thought in order to understand the Divine words. "Why do ye not understand my speech? Even because ye cannot hear my word." So in Proverbs: It is all simple to them that understand, and plain to them that keep knowledge. How the Lord shows in John iv. that conscience is the inlet to intelligence in Divine things; and thus the heart becomes engaged. Rejected and driven out from Judæa, He sat weary on the well of Sychar. A woman, lonely (it was not the hour when women go forth to draw water) and weary with sin, evidently a strong and ardent nature that had sought happiness with eager pursuit, and sank through it into sin, and not found rest to her spirit (how many such are there in the world), dragged on a life of toil, and, in the midst of it, thought sometimes on Gerizim and Jerusalem, and knew there was a Messiah to come. There might be happiness and rest somewhere; she had none. Toil and weariness she had, and the last evidently in spirit as well as body. Jesus had toil and weariness too, but through love, not through sin, save the sin of others, and that could not weary love, and He knew where rest was. He was it. The Son of God, the Judge of all, had, humanly speaking, put Himself in a position where He was debtor to this woman for a drink of cold water. But He soon draws her out; He speaks of the gift of God, of a well of water springing up into everlasting life. All was dark in the Samaritan woman's mind. She moved in the circle of her own weariness: that she felt, the fruit of her sin and toil after happiness. And with all the movings within, that predominated and filled her mind, for, in fact, what had she else? What does the Lord do? "Go call thy husband, and come hither." "I have no husband." "Thou hast well said," replied the Lord, "I have no husband: thou hast had five husbands; and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband: in that speakest thou truly." Now a ray of light breaks in. "Sir, I perceive thou art a prophet." The word of God by the Lord has Divine authority in her heart, because it has reached her conscience. She has found a man who has told her all that ever she did. Who knew that? The prophet's word has Divine authority. Yet she does not yet get to wells of water. The Divine communications made to her were quite unintelligible; but much was done. He who knew all her life, all her sin, had been sitting in grace by her, willing to be helped by her. Grace was there as well as truth. She had found the Christ; and leaves her water-pot and her care with it, and becomes a messenger of that which is good news for all. Gerizim and Jerusalem are all alike, and alike nothing. The Father is seeking worshippers in spirit and in truth. Now here we find a picture of the opening of a soul to understanding, and the reception of the Divine things. The presenting of Divine things of the highest character in grace does not do it. The natural heart remains closed. Even when there are moral wants and cravings, Divine things are not understood at all. God makes His way through the conscience. Then the word is received. At the moment, the heart does not get farther than its present capacity. Still what has been spoken of has been spoken of for it; and grace makes all its own. Jesus in grace has been with it. Oh, what a difference—man's speculations, and God seeing the fields white for harvest! The Lord refreshing His spirit when rejected by the pride of man, not with the water of the well, but with love finding its bliss in hearts filled with wretchedness drinking of the one refreshing well-spring that has visited this world. He had meat to eat His disciples knew not of. What a place for this poor Samaritan, what a place for us; to refresh, stupid creatures that we are—the heart of Jesus, because He is love. Nothing brighter, nothing more genuine, than the effect of her new-found joy, which makes this poor woman the messenger of God's visiting this world to the self-satisfied inhabitants of Sychar. She was just the one that suited the Lord.

W. It is a lovely picture, and I think the moral elements you have touched justly given; but on that men may differ. We see thereby, evidently, how the estimate of the force of passages depends on the individual spiritual state.

H. Of course, and there is nothing like the picture itself here. What Mr. Jowett says is true! All explanations mar. They are only the expression of our feelings and moral perceptions of that which, in itself, is complete and perfect. But remark another thing here, showing how absurd it is to speak of just the simple meaning to the hearer—that is, man's measure, according to the words used. We have here the full power of eternal life as in one who drinks of the water Christ gives; the whole of His person in humiliation; who it is that saith to thee "Give me to drink;" His relationship to sinners; how the Divine word reaches the conscience; the passing of grace out of ceremonial Judaism, where it was according to promise, to bring mercy to the vilest; the place Jesus takes thus as rejected; His human estate as weary with us, not having where to lay His head, yet giving as God; the substitution of worship in spirit and truth for Jerusalem or Gerizim, yet salvation of the Jews; the revelation of the Father acting in grace, seeking to have such worshippers; the total change in the soul, when once it is taken possession of by Christ, however ignorant. These, which I only recall from memory, are all directly before the soul in this short but touching interview. How much more who can say? The mere literal facts, read as any other history, cannot bring the mind at all into the apprehension of what is here spoken of. If I take the commonest words, as Son—the Son of God, the Son of the Father, a mere literal apprehension affords me nothing, or error; or the Word made flesh. I shall be told, these are mysteries; but the language is simple, and what I am showing is that, with the simplest language, there must be Divine apprehensions in the soul to understand Scripture; and that understanding it as Thucydides or Sophocles is just simple nonsense. They have human ideas, and are understood humanly. If there are Divine ideas, they must be understood divinely. Yet I have only human language, and hence my way of understanding it must be different; and, I must add, the way of writing it, because the way of thinking it must be different. Whether it be by inspiration is the question we have to come to; only I say here, that to give Divine ideas with certainty, or to be the truth, they must have a Divine source, a Divine author. Man's ideas about God were utterly false and degraded without it. His power of thought, as such, cannot be adequate to form the idea, or clothe it in language, so as to be a communication of truth, an authentic revelation of God's mind. I conclude that as to the general principle of interpretation proposed by Mr. Jowett, he contradicts himself in the first place, and happily so; next, the system is intellectually an absurdity; thirdly, that it is contradictory to the facts of the case; and, fourthly, the Lord Himself, as do His Apostles, assure us that it is not true. The ideas and subjects of Scripture being Divine, and language human, formed by human ideas, to understand it simply as it is expressed by a human interpretation of the words, is a manifest contradiction and absurdity. Let us get the best text to have what is to be interpreted, and be relieved from traditional glosses; let us have the most accurate knowledge of Hebrew and Greek at our command; all this is every way to be desired. But, when you have all, in the nature of things the text cannot be interpreted as the words would strike the hearer who stood as a natural man with human thoughts, I may boldly say, in any case whatever. For what is wrong in principle is wrong always. When God is in the world, His ways and actions have, and must have, a meaning which a mere man's cannot have, because He is God. If a Jew had ridden into Jerusalem on an ass, what would it have been? Nothing. If the Lord did? In one sense, the history of the world turned on it as a last public testimony. It was a moment which made the Lord weep, and God perfect praise out of the mouths of babes and sucklings, to still the enemy and the avenger. Had these held their peace, the stones would have immediately cried out. I cannot conceive anything more absurd than the thought that the works or the words of the Lord in the earth are to be taken just as another's words, and so understood. They cannot, for He says things none else could say, and does what none else could do; but were they the same, the bearing would be quite different. Does Mr. Jowett believe that the Lord was in the world, or that the Word of God is a revelation at all? or, if he does, have they no more weight or bearing than another's, supposing he has the text and grammar all clear? He has told us he does, and told us he does not. If his heart is cleft in twain, may he throw away the worsser part of it.

W. I do feel what a solemn question it all is. Your reference to John iv., though so brief, again led the heart back to these fresh springs which make one taste that one is in a region that nothing else is like. It is a folly, a horror, a senselessness no term can reach, to compare the movings and speakings of a God walking in love in this world, with the writings and actings of other men. If they were such, He was not that at all; and I thoroughly agree with you, that no human language, taken in its ordinary terms as expressing ordinary things, can express that. The statement contradicts itself. It is still a question, Is there a revelation? Has God revealed Himself or not? Let the language be made grammatically clear, of course. It is the vehicle God has been pleased to use, and as a vehicle I employ it. But when you come to the meaning, the interpretation, we enter on a Divine order of thought, and must be in it ourselves to understand. Here we are dependent on God, as in everything else.

H. Surely ; and hence it is that, though they may be bad commentators, of course, as to the text, the poor and unlearned, who are really exercised in conscience and in Divine truth, understand the truth better, as to the substance of it, than the learned man, "who leans to his own understanding ;" because they have personally learnt where the connection between an exercised soul and God is formed—they have learnt it by their spiritual wants ; and Christ is that connection, and the mind of Christ is in the Scripture, and thus they have the key to it. If they pretend to interpret texts, they may very likely go astray ; but as to the doctrine of Scripture, their faith is clear and sure. No exercise of human understanding can give that ; no chemist, even if his analysis be right, knows what water is like a man who is ready to die of thirst.

I conclude, therefore, as to the general principle of Mr. Jowett, and especially as to the first part, that he is fundamentally wrong. "The true glory and note of divinity in these latter," he says—(Jewish and Christian Scriptures)—"being, not that they have hidden, mysterious, or double meanings, but a simple and universal one." Now I look for neither mysticism nor logic ; I reject them, as such, both. When Mr. Jowett speaks of double meanings, if he means that two distinct meanings of the words are to be taken—"good meanings," as theologians used to say—it is at once to be rejected ; but if he confines the meaning of the Scriptures to the narrowness of human wording and thought, his principle is false. In the communication of Divine thoughts in human language, the bearing of the sentences, from the richness of the truths in them, is various. If I say "God is a Spirit ; and they that worship Him must worship Him in spirit and in truth, for the Father seeketh such to worship Him ;" I may justly take up the contrast with Jerusalem and Gerizim, and the whole question of God's dispensations ; or I may justly take up God's being a Spirit, which in the nature of things requires a spiritual worship. It must be such. I may also the difference between God in his nature requiring such, and the Father, as a name of grace and relationship, seeking such; and how now, in this double name, He gave His character to all approach to Him; as the Lord said, "I go to my Father and your Father, and my God and your God;" and, in the Ephesians, "The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ has blessed us with all spiritual blessings in heavenly places in Christ."

I add, as Mr. Jowett complains of connecting passages by some hidden connection, that when I find, "Come out from among them, and be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty," I may insist on the need of separation from an ungodly world and evil, in order to be in relationship with God; or I may note that there are three Scriptural relationships with God: two expressly noted and distinguished in the Old Testament—Almighty, and Lord or Jehovah; the first to Abraham, the second to Israel and Moses; and that He who bore them both takes here that of the Father. Now all these are not double senses, but Divine truths, coming from an everlasting source; and being the expression of it, and of Him who, in infinite richness of being and character, must be in relationship with all things—above all, through all, and in all believers; and the statement of these truths must carry all that God is as spoken of in the statement, or displayed in the acts contained in the passage. Of course, all passages are not alike full. It is not logical conclusions, which are not in the passage, which I find or seek; nor mystic inventions, which are not there either; but the mind of God, found in it, that I look for. To say that that is not mysterious, is, as to many passages, begging Mr. Jowett's pardon, absurd. A religion which depends on the Word being made flesh, and the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of God, and sending down the Holy Ghost to make our bodies temples; which tells us that we are members of Christ's body, of His flesh and of His bones ; which shows God become a man, and obedient as such, and dying as such, and other truths I need not enlarge upon, must be mysterious in the true sense of the word, and, indeed, in every sense. I do not know if Mr. Jowett denies all these things. What angels desire to look into can well be supposed to be so. Christ made sin ; our dwelling in God, and God in us ; our being, in this world, as Christ is, so as to have boldness in the day of judgment ; the miraculous birth of Christ ; all speak with one voice. He who excludes mysteries from the Word, excludes sense from it, instead of making it intelligible. I do not mean by mysterious that it cannot be understood. The Scripture meaning of mystery is, that known only by revelation, not by human knowledge. The initiated know mysteries, the uninitiated not—that is the meaning of the word ; but the true initiated are those taught of God. If God reveals, there must be mysteries ; and, from the nature of what He reveals, true initiation must exist to understand it. Its expression cannot be at the level of human ideas. All the deepest expressions of good and evil are brought together. God and sin meet in the cross. Christ is God, and is forsaken of God. Christ is the power and Prince of Life, and He dies ; but through this destroys the power of death. You cannot have such things brought together in the same act without mysterious truth. When all that is perfectly good in God and evil in man meet, and are centred indeed in one person, or the condition he takes, the human mind must be taught of God to know it ; and God alone, who knows all things perfectly, can reveal it simply, because He does know perfectly ; but He reveals all in man, all in Himself, and all in Christ in it. I know, as one may see in Mr. Jowett's Commentary, a person may rest on the surface, and seek to destroy all depth in them, and bend them to the standard of the human mind and scope of human thought. But I do not see any great sense in this ; that such a fact as God becoming a man should not suppose immense depths of thought, purpose, and moral truth, and reveal them. If Mr. Jowett denies all this, then I get simple infidelity. I know what I have to deal with. If not, I have a Christianity in which the depth of my moral nature, old and new, and in the exercises and conflicts of both, meet God where He and sin have met, and Christ in the consummation of ages is come to put it away. And perfect love and Divine righteousness find their manifestations and ground. The simplest expressions of Scripture awake profound depths in our moral nature. What does putting away sin mean? What Christ the Son of God appearing to do it? What does the Lamb of God mean? It is easy for philosophers to avoid all these expressions, and make a Christianity of their own. Only it is in no part the Christianity that is revealed or known in the world. But interpreting the Christianity that was revealed in Scripture, and has possessed men's minds for ages, by saying that the true Divine in it is not having mysteries, is false in fact, and absurd in idea. Mr. Jowett gives pages on conversion and change of character to excuse and suppose it possible, at least in uneducated persons! And—what I trust shows that he may have tasted it, but shows how ashamed he is of owning it before educated persons—excuses it thus: "It was the quiet fancy of a sentimentalist to ask whether any one who remembers the first sight of a beloved person could doubt the existence of magic. We may ask another question: Can any one who has ever known the love of Christ doubt the existence of a spiritual power?" I hope from this it is true in the writer's case; but it is very low ground to take in speaking of the dying and living love of the Son of God. It may suit an Oxford theologian seeking to emancipate himself from the trammels of conventional doctrines and creeds. A serious Christian hopes for the writer, and passes over an expression of the truth so unworthy of one who has felt it.

cation of the simple meaning of the words as a hearer would understand them with one meaning. The idea is entirely false. Mr. Jowett admits, "They must speak as from one with whom a thousand years is as one day, and one day as a thousand years; but," he says, "not so as to connect distinct and distant objects." Now I think this also unphilosophical, contradicted by the facts and statements of Scripture, and untrue. If the prophecies are to be interpreted as the words of one with whom "a thousand years are as one day," as Mr. Jowett says, it is impossible not to see that the bearing of these words must be something of larger, wider import than the circumstances of the moment, and must reach on to epochs where the thoughts and words of such an one will be fulfilled. In this day of a thousand years, all in man's hand changes, shifts, is subverted; new things are set up, new interests created. If the Word of one Divine day can reach over to the end of it, it must be occupied with a plan that runs through it all, through all these human changes, which are but the risings and fallings of a tumultuous sea, where the equal tide below the surface pursues its constant course. There is a Divine plan above and beyond all the local circumstances. As Peter says, 'no prophecy of Scripture is of any private interpretation,' does not solve itself in the individual circumstances which occasion it, but enters into the great plan of God. Yet, in the love of God, we may say they must connect themselves with those to whom they are addressed. I doubt not, therefore, that the prophecies were often occasioned by present circumstances, and comfort given to saints at the time by them; but to say they did not look out to a future of blessing to Israel, of the final setting aside of the power of evil, of the coming in of a great promised deliverer, is to fail in recognizing the most obvious fact in all prophecy. Jews, and rationalist infidels who think that the prophets were national poets, apply it, no doubt, to Israel; and if we are to listen to the dull rhapsodies of Drs. Bunsen and Williams, Jeremiah is the sufferer; but Mr. Jowett is not yet there. IIe

owns God has something to do with Scripture, and we will not return to these foolish and stupid imaginations. Take Joel. There it is not to be doubted that a famine through locusts and insect ravages is the occasion referred to. But do you or I believe, or any reasonable person, to say no more, that He whose words are to be interpreted as the words of one with whom a thousand years are as one day, has written a book for all ages to determine the result at that time of an inroad of caterpillars, the effect of whose ravages, however trying, would disappear in a few years? Could any one read the book and not see that God's present judgments and mercies are made the occasion of drawing the attention of Israel to their state, and lead the awakened conscience to God's judgment of evil, and full deliverance for those who repented and called upon the name of the Lord, when the people should never be ashamed, the Spirit poured out on all flesh, and Judah dwell for ever, and every temporal blessing be theirs; and, finally, the harvest and vintage of the whole earth be reaped and trodden—God dwelling there in Zion? The famine connected the present circumstances with this promise of plenty and blessing, but no one can but see that the prophet is rapt into future times. Now, if this is meant by a double meaning, it is true. That is, that the Lord does give what is a present comfort, yet clothes it in language which leads on to His ultimate plans, so as to keep the godly hope of His people up, and often passes entirely into that with which the present is not linked at all. The point of transition may be sometimes obscure. But the general principle is undeniable, and such a character of prophecy worthy of God, and indeed alone worthy of Him. In Jeremiah and in Isaiah it is in vain to deny that, with encouragement suited to the occasion, the prophet refers to the coming of Messiah, and a time of unparalleled and continued blessing. It is incredible to suppose that God had not His own plans in view, and the great result of His government of the world when man had been fully tried on the ground of responsibility.

W. I must say I think principle and fact concur to prove this. I mean that God held out the hope of a great coming deliverance and blessing, whatever momentary encouragement He might give; and that this time in which His plans would be accomplished must be mainly in view, though present circumstances would draw the prophet's attention, and give rise to exhortation and warning. And we must not forget that in fact Israel was waiting for this time, and that in all the East, as Tacitus tells us, the expectation prevailed.

H. Nor is this all. Almost the earliest prophecy (Balaam's, which reaches to the Star of Jacob, was earlier) declares that the order of the world was all arranged in respect of Israel (Deut. xxxii. 8). And further, that Israel would be given up into the hands of their enemies, and afterwards restored, and the Gentiles associated with them, through overwhelming judgments, when "God shall arise to judgment, and to help all the meek of the earth."

Isaiah (vi.) shows us Israel given up too, and for a long period, and yet preserved in a remnant; and the rejection of Him (l.) who found none to answer when He came and called, as the cause of their being laid aside. Yet this followed by the fullest promise of restoration and glory. So Hosca declares they shall remain many days desolate, without true God or false, but seek Jehovah their God, and David their king, at the end. So Micah declares they will insult and reject the Judge of Israel born at Bethlehem, and therefore be given up; but that this same man will be their peace. And again, the largest and fullest blessing is promised to a remnant through Him, while judgment will be executed on the nations, who yet will be blessed as by the dew from heaven which tarries not for men. Now, my object is not to explain, of course, here all prophecy, but to note that there was a reference to a great scheme or plan, such as must be in God's mind, though He may encourage and comfort at the time; and not only so, but that there was something more specific—a giving up Israel, the beloved people, for a time (during which God would be found of them that sought Him not); that that, whatever other sins they had, was caused by their rejection of Jehovah coming as a man in mercy; that this caused their divorce from Him; and that then a long undefined interval would elapse, and blessing afterward arrive, but introduced by judgments—the Lord pleading with all flesh. This gives a uniform plan, declared in statements verified before our eyes in the state of the Jews consequent on Christ's coming. This necessarily threw on the application of Scripture prophecy to the end, when alone the plans of God would have their decided and full result, evil be set aside, and the earth blessed under Messiah. This principle the New Testament confirms (Matt. xxiii. 39; Rom. xi. 25, 26); and other passages. We find the Old testifying in one entire passage, of one coming in grace and gentleness, and then judgment. The New quotes what relates to the grace, and stops short of the judgment. Thus, Luke iv. 19, from Isaiah lxi. 1. So Matt. xxi. 5, from Zech. ix. 9. The New Testament leads us itself to the same point. Thus, Matt. x.: "Ye shall not have gone over the cities of Israel till the Son of Man be come." Now, He was there; but there was a presenting of Him to human responsibility, and bringing Him in in power. So the Lord personally tells them they should not see Him till they said, Blessed be He that cometh. Till then their house should be desolate. I refer to these to show that Scripture constantly refers to a Divine accomplishment of a plan to be fulfilled, which seemed at first to fail—a failure which was the occasion of bringing in the Church on quite different principles, the mystery hidden from ages and generations, Israel being set aside. Even the Epistles follow the same order. The quotation of Ps. lxxviii. in Eph. iv. goes only so far as it does not apply distinctly to Israel. Finally, I take up Daniel, and I find a declaration of a period appointed to Jerusalem for God to bring in righteousness and blessing—the famous period of seventy weeks; but when this is entered on in detail, we have seven weeks of trial to build the city, then sixty-two weeks to Messiah the Prince, who is cut off, and takes nothing (for that is the true sense of the words; not, "and not for Himself"). Then comes a long undated period of war and desolation. And when is the promise of the preceding verses supposed by the prophecy to be fulfilled? It must come after the end of the war; till then there are desolations—the city and sanctuary being destroyed already. It is put off for an unknown length of time, and the unfinished period of seventy weeks gets its conclusion at the end. That is the unequivocal structure of the prophecy. (Daniel never goes on to the blessing beyond the times of the Gentles.) That is, the prophets suppose a rejection of Israel for a long period, the cutting off of Messiah, and afterwards the bringing in of full blessing through Him. I am not now saying they are real prophecies to be fulfilled; nor, as to this point, does it alter the case, absurd as the theory is, if Daniel wrote in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes. My assertion is, that the prophets have a scheme of this kind,—an appearing of grace, as Christianity expresses it, teaching us to wait for the appearing of the glory—a putting off to a remote period of earthly blessing, introduced by Messiah and judgments, the accomplishment of these prophecies, and of the blessing of Israel; Messiah being rejected meanwhile by Israel, and Israel therefore given up. But, whatever particular warnings and consolations there may have been, this shows that, while addressed to these generations, and often occasioned by their circumstances, prophecy always looked out farther in its true scope. I am speaking of its plan, not of its accomplishment. He who would interpret it with that kind of simplicity which would leave this out, leaves all the clearly demonstrable intention of its Author out, and that is a bad way of interpreting.

W. I seize clearly the purport of what you say, and it binds the whole together, from the Pentateuch to Revelation, and brings in the New Testament into its place in the organization of the whole. I feel that if God gives a revelation, and that, as entering into the wants of His people as Scripture professes to do, He must enter into local circumstances, and present events so as to meet these wants; and yet God must have a plan and a purpose. And Scripture clearly points out that He has. But the Church seems to stand on peculiar ground.

H. Doubtless it does. The testimony of Paul takes up man as wholly ruined in nature, and reveals a heavenly man and a new creation; and associates those called during the rejection of the true heavenly man with Him in heaven; so that they are heavenly. He was the Lord from heaven. They, as new created, have a part with Him, and, having the Spirit, are united to Him, and become His bride and His body, are joint-heirs with Him the first-born among many brethren. But the current of promise runs on too in connection with the original promise to Abraham. The Jewish branches were broken off; and we grafted in; but the chain of promise was unbroken, though there are blessings above promise in the mystery of union with Christ. Thus the Church is associated with Him for ever.

W. And when the blessing comes in?

H. She will joy and minister in it as thus united to Him and joint-heir with Him, and blessedly so, though her highest joy be Himself.

W. Where is this at all drawn out of Scripture?

H. The bringing as children into the inheritance, and the tree of promise, in Rom. viii. and xi.; the relationship with our God and Father, and all His counsels in Christ, in Ephesians, specially chap. i. Our having personally all with Christ is still more brought out in the last chapters of John's Gospel. It is this testimony of a second Adam, a last man, which alone gives its true Divinely moral character to the New Testament, and gives the just sense of the real bearing of Christianity for us, animating with a heavenly energy, and imprinting a heavenly character on our whole position.

W. The Gospel then comes in, in its full character, in a suspension of the regular course of prophetic promise?

H. Exactly. And the Jews are obliged to come in, in mere mercy, as a Gentile. Yet all promise will be fulfilled to them. This it is that makes the Apostles adore the depths of the riches of God's wisdom. The promises meanwhile run on; yet a heavenly people is formed. All in heaven and earth is to be gathered up into one head in Christ. Besides individual salvation and blessing, there are two great topics in Scripture—God's government of the world, and the Church. In Christ both find their Head. He will rule over all, Israel being the earthly centre, while the Church is united to Him. Meanwhile, as He has perfectly revealed God and the Father, we are brought into full personal relationship with what God is in Himself, and as children, or sons with a Father, a relationship of which He Himself is the pattern as man, His redemption work being the basis of all, in the power of which He fills all things.

W. It does give a Divine completeness to the revelation of the mind of God, which is full of interest though we see but corners of it; yet corners of a whole worthy of God. The time will come when we shall know as we are known, and, better still, enjoy God Himself fully.

H. That is indeed our one chief joy, though we shall admire Him in all His plans and ways. The place of Christ is lovely, too, in this. The glory of God enlightens the heavenly city. But such a bright blaze of glory, though needed to know Him, has nothing personal in it. It dazzles more than it concentrates the affections; but the Lamb is the light thereof. Here the heart finds its home and centre. One known, one who has loved us, one who is divinely at home there, and the very light of that glory; but has never lost the character in which He has served us in the depths of love. For where love is active it serves. But I turn to another point of the prophetic revelation of God before we leave this part of our inquiry. We have accepted interpreting prophecy as the words of One with whom a thousand years are as one day. But, if this be so, then there is one author really of the whole, though divers instruments; and, though surely adapting His words in grace by those instruments to various circumstances that arise, as grace would do, yet, I must find one mind as to the substance and purpose of the whole. And, though interpreting each part simply, and just as I find it, as to the direct meaning of the passages (which I think very important myself), taking what a prophecy says as it says it, yet the one mind from which all flows and which runs through all, I shall surely find, and do find; and consequently (not a similarity or a copying) but a fitting of each part into the whole, and into its own place in the whole, each part being suited for that very reason, to its own object and part in that whole; and thus, secondly, a connection, not immediate, but, through the whole, of each with every other part. As the members of the body different entirely in service, yet serve the whole, and serve each other. I get Jews, Gentiles, Israel, Messiah, their history developed in multifarious ways; but all treated by one mind to whom all belong, history bringing out the thoughts of that one mind by each one, in the sphere they belong to, and by a revealed bearing one upon another. Law, the opening up of wider thoughts by prophets, obedient royalty, punishment of evil, absolute Gentile dominion, Messiah, sacrifice, endless principles brought out in germ, death, resurrection, promises, and all running into one another in one great scheme. For it is a remarkable fact that Judaism has given rise, whatever people think of it, to a more enlarged unfolding of every question as to good and evil, and man's relationship with God, has more touched all the springs of human nature than anything that ever claimed the attention of the heart of man. A being separate from good, that is, from God, yet capable (by grace) of it. One who had a will of his own, but was responsible; who had acquired the knowledge of good and evil, conscience—yet was under the power of evil: who had been made in the likeness of God, but had set up to be independent and do without Him. Such a being must be exercised in this way, to know himself and be restored to God.

W. When you say Judaism, do you not think Christianity does so?

H. Every restored soul must in principle be so exercised; but I look at Christianity itself rather as the answer—the divine and blessed answer to all the questions that have been raised. Thus far then, W., of the general principles raised by Mr. Jowett, as far as a conversation of the kind can meet them. I conclude with him that we must interpret prophecy, the Old Testament, as the words of One with whom a thousand years are as one day. But I do not think he has wisely weighed what the import of such a statement is. We may next follow him into details as far as they affect the principle.

W. But, before you go on to these, I should like to ask you a question.

H. Well?

W. You do not, I am sure, receive all the spiritualization, as it is called, and endless applications of Scripture made by men's minds. I thought you took prophetic Scriptures in their direct and plain meaning.

H. Surely, I do. I reject entirely this mystifying of the Old Testament. There are great spiritual principles and truths which are found, and must be found, in all that divinely unfolds God's relationships with men. God's faithfulness, His mercy, His patient goodness; man's trust and integrity of heart, his humbleness, the fear of God. But when I seek the meaning of a passage, I seek simply what God meant, where it is His testimony; or in what light He seeks to put man's conduct, if it is a history of that, or what is His purpose, as a whole, in the narration. I have already spoken of the difference of encouragement or warning afforded at the time, and its passing on to give the subject its place in the general purpose of God to be accomplished in a future day. What I object to, is the unintelligent, and, if you please, unphilosophical, irrational way of looking for the plain meaning. "The office of the interpreter is not to add another (interpretation), but to recover the original one." Now here we are entirely agreed, but then, it is added, "The meaning, that is, of the words as they struck on the ears, or flashed before the eyes of those who first heard and read them." I affirm this to be in every case false, if the fine language means anything. I have already referred to the soberer expression, "the meaning which it had to the mind of the prophets . . . or to the hearer or reader." Now, if I am reading or hearing a statement, I do not in any way look to the effect on the hearers. That may be a casual help, but no more. If I seek the meaning, I must seek not the effect on others, but the intention of the speaker or writer. That as simply as you please, and nothing else. I have nothing to do with the impressions produced on hearers. There may have been none, or a false one, according to previous prejudices, or an imperfect impression; or even a right one as regards themselves, yet, not taking in the full scope of what was said. If I am to believe Scripture, the prophets themselves, so far from receiving a first impression and abiding by it, inquired into the sense of their own prophecies, and were taught of God that they referred, in the great topics connected with the purpose of God and deliverance, to after times. See 1 Pet. i. 11, 12. But it is surely useless to reason, to prove that if I am interpreting a writing or words, I must seek simply the purpose and meaning of the speaker and nothing else. Now, this only one right thing Mr. Jowett leaves wholly out; it never occurs to him to think of it. I say, therefore, that his whole system is irrational and false. He is so full of the borrowed idea that they were temporary themes, referring in oriental language simply to the national hearers of the day, that he takes this as the measure of the meaning, and thus lays down a principle that is as false as can be. But that is all borrowed. That is German Mr. Jowett, but the other Mr. Jowett, I trust the true one, tells us we are to listen to them as the words of One with whom a thousand years is as one day; one of abiding, unfailing counsels, which everything tends to bring about, who is not slack concerning His promise. The effect of the great fact, that it is God who speaks, I have already spoken of. Let me add another example from Ezekiel. He refers to the last days in the most explicit manner, and with developed details. Yet, in the final scene he declares that the mighty one Gog who comes up had been often spoken of (Ezek. xxxviii. 17). Hence, if I take the prophets as they present themselves, and as Ezekiel speaking in God's name declares, they were certainly, under the name of a then existing power, speaking of a mighty one at the end of the world's course when Jehovah would make Himself known in His government. It is remarkable, that, when the prophecy goes out of the geographical name by which it is identified, it uses language intelligible at the time, as far as showing it was beyond the limits of their geographical designation, Isa. xviii. A land beyond the rivers of Cush, that is the Euphrates and Nile. The prophet connects it with Israelitish ideas, but goes far away beyond, as he must, to fill up the picture of the last days. But I should go too much into detail if I pursued this farther. Only remark that the prophets (we shall come to the New Testament) were simple impostors if they were not inspired, for they give their burdens as oracles, as directly the words of God: thus saith the Lord; or, the Word of the Lord came to me, or a vision was given. If then Mr. Jowett rejects the prophets as inspired, he must hold them for impostors. If not, then there is direct inspiration, a communication of the mind of God through a man, as he was, moved by the Holy Ghost, in words which entitled the prophet to say, Thus saith the Lord, and the Apostles certainly did not hold them for impostors, but refer to them as true prophets who had prophesied about Jesus. I suppose Mr. Jowett would hardly hold that to be the direct and only meaning as received by the first readers or hearers. But if this be so, the question takes a new form. Is the New Testament entirely deprived of those Divine communications which abounded before, and form the Old Testament? And is that which is given us by Apostles and Evangelists to reveal the perfect religion of God less from Himself than the communications which were given to Israel in their imperfect and preparatory state? This is hard to believe. But all this leads us to the second point, in these days an all important one. Is there inspiration, and what is it?

W. It is an important question, and is even more embarrassing as to the new than as to the old: because the new pronounces on the old. But I see plainly, as to the question of the inspiration of the Old Testament, of the prophets at least (and, indeed, the Lord cites the whole volume), they must be inspired, or impostors giving as the Lord's words what were not so. But then the Lord's statements are insurmountable. "The Scriptures cannot be broken," for instance; for He must have known it if they were impostors, yet cites them as true prophets, and declares they must be fulfilled, that they spoke of Him. But if the prophets were inspired we have direct inspiration, and the mind of God as far as given to them. And this, and this only, is what we have to seek, and the only question is, as you say: Is Christianity founded on a less explicit revelation from God than Judaism? You cannot say it was founded on Christ, and that is sufficient; for He wrote nothing, and I do not know what He was, with any Divine faith, if the writings of the New Testament were not inspired. I see the question is a most grave one; while it is of the utmost weight to see that the Old Testament is certainly inspired, because the fundamental question is settled, and the casting the New Testament out of the limits of inspired communications is a poor idea altogether then. To say that an imperfect revelation is inspired, a perfect one not, is somewhat hard to believe: still we must see from Scripture itself.

H. Surely that is the way as to inquiry; for it really proves itself its Divine power in the conscience. And this last is the only true knowledge of inspiration. I know rationalists try and put off with an air of superiority, as rejected by enlightened people (that is, themselves), what they have not got, and therefore cannot feel the force of; but I am not afraid of avowing, in the fullest extent, the doctrine of the Reformation, which is necessarily the doctrine of every believer; that Scripture proves itself by its own power. I go further—it never proves itself, never can prove itself, if it be true, in any other way. And so, moreover, it declares: faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God. He that believeth on the Son of God hath the witness in himself. The law of the Lord is perfect, converting the soul. The entrance of Thy Word giveth light, it giveth understanding to the simple. If what is called light requires something to show it, it is a proof that it is not really light. In the nature of things, light shows itself and all else. It is not what we mean by light, what a man who has eyes knows it to be by having eyes, if it has to be shown. It does require eyes to see it. If a man has not eyes he cannot of course see it, or know what it is at all. Nor can any one tell him what it is, or make himself understood in speaking of it. He wants the faculty of what is to be proved. If a man does not see the Word of God to be such, it is a proof that he has no moral eyes, no faith. A man asks me how I can prove honey to be sweet. I say, if you cannot taste it you must remain ignorant. And note, if there be a Word of God, it must be moral light, and perfect light, Divine light; cannot be otherwise. If what is presented to me be not such, I say at once, then it is not God's Word. It may be dawn, or shine through clouds, or be noon-day, but it is in its nature light, or it is not God's Word. Hence, in the nature of things it must reveal itself. If it do not it is not God's Word. Whether a man has eyes to see is another question: but one who has knows he sees the light. Hence I am not afraid of the language of another of our Essays. "Calvin did not shrink from saying that Scripture shone sufficiently by its own light. As long as this could be kept to, the Protestant theory of belief was whole and sound—at least it was as sound as the Catholic. In both, Reason, aided by spiritual illumination, performs the subordinate function of recognizing the supreme authority of the Church and of the Bible respectively. But learned controversy and abatement of zeal drove the Protestants generally from the hardy but irrational assertion of Calvin." I dare say they did. That is, as men lost faith, they lost conviction of the Divine authority of the Word. How could they do otherwise? It is stating the same thing in other terms. But Calvin, as every believer, could not say otherwise, because it had shone thus in his own soul, and in no other way. The Church was against it, nature was against it, interest was against it. God's Word was too mighty. But I say more: If the Scriptures be not thus received they are never received at all. It professes to be the Word and testimony of God. If a witness has to be accredited, and proved to be true, the witness is not believed at all on his own testimony. Hence, as long as Scripture has to be proved by reason, or accredited by the Church, God is not believed because He has spoken, that is, there is no real faith. Such reasoning or accrediting may lead me to believe it afterwards, so far as leading me to examine the testimony, which thus may acquire force over my soul as true. But, as long as reasoning or accrediting is the reason why I believe it, I do not receive it as the Word of God. I do not believe God in it. I do not receive it as His Word. If I believe Thomas because James has said that what he has said is true, I do not believe Thomas at all.

W. Yes; but if James has said that Thomas was truthful, not that what he said was true?

H. I do not want any one to tell me God is truthful. What is wanting is to know that it is His testimony. And mark, if I cannot without James's testimony know that Thomas's word is to be trusted, it is a proof that I do not know Thomas, and that I am incapable of myself of discovering the truthfulness of his statements. He is true, but I cannot find it out. So with the rationalist. He cannot find it out if it be God's Word, if the testimony is truthful. It is his incapacity. He may be an open infidel. But, if not, all his state means is, that he is incapable of discerning the Word of God. He has the will to make difficulties, because he does not like to have a word directly from God; but he cannot say it is not—he cannot help me in judging if it be. And, indeed, if I believe Thomas only because James says he is truthful, I still do not know Thomas myself; and if this be true in the case we are speaking of, I do not know God still, and my believing His Word is of no real use whatever; for the knowledge of God is its true value. But more than this,—if God has spoken, either He has not so spoken as to bind my conscience, that is, He has spoken to no purpose at all, and badly, or He has spoken so as to bind my conscience, and it is not according to the rationalist bound. I therefore am guilty and blind; for I do not receive and bow to what ought to bind my conscience. If revelation be not, therefore, wholly denied, either God has spoken incompetently and badly, or I am bound to receive and bow to it.

W. That is true; and it is easy to decide which is the case. But do you mean sound reasonings cannot be a means of convincing the mind that the Scriptures are the Word of God?

H. They cannot give faith in it. They may lead to it in this way, namely, in that they prove the absurdity of what is said to deny it, and prove thus the absurdity of denying it, so that the mind bows to it, and the Word is left to its own force; but there is never faith till it has exercised this force.

W. I see, it may open all the way to the Bible, but the Bible must do its own work.

H. Exactly.

W. Well, it is true if you did not believe me till what I said was accredited by another, it would not be believing me.

H. And note, in passing, how this applies to the Romanist ground. The word or testimony of God may, of course, act on souls there as elsewhere by its own power; but as to faith—real Divine faith—in the soul, as long as I believe on the Church's warrant, I do not believe God at all; that is, I do not believe anything Divine. I believe in the Church, but not yet on God or His Word. The Roman Catholic ground of faith is total unbelief. They say I cannot believe the Word of God till the Church accredits it. Now, I hold it a great mercy to be brought up to receive the Bible to be the Word of God, because I go to it as a little child, and it is free to exercise its power over me. But I have not faith till it does.

We will now turn to Mr. Jowett's statements as to inspiration. The greater part is utter fallacy, or fancies of men, which are only to be left to their own worthlessness. He gives various views of inspiration as contradictory, in order to show the uncertainty of men on the subject, when, in fact, all are compatible and true, so that there is no dilemma at all—unless what is said of the kind of inspiration of particular books. All this is throwing dust in people's eyes. What the upright soul wants to know when it takes up a Bible, is: I can trust this; I will sit down to know what God will say to me, what He has said, what His mind is. As to the manner of inspiration he knows nothing about it. What he reads must be the Word of God for him. He must trust it, bow to it as such, and looks for the aid of that Spirit which indited it. And the Doctors in theology know no more about it than he does—nor cannot; because they are not inspired, and can have no consciousness of the manner of the Spirit's action. The Apostle could not explain it. Mr. Jowett says it is held by some that there is an inspiration of superintendence, and by others an inspiration of suggestion. Now, I believe both fully. If the evangelists, as eye-witnesses, had facts to record which they remembered, the Spirit had only to take care they were rightly used, Himself so to use the memory, and not permit the narrator to narrate them otherwise than according to His mind. There is an inspiration of suggestion—as the history of creation or prophecy. And Christ expressly promises both: “The Spirit of truth will guide you into all truth; for He shall not speak of Himself, but what He shall hear that shall He speak, and He will show you things to come.” And again: “He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance.” Of course the Essayists know better about it than the Scriptures. But Mr. Jowett tells us we are to take Scripture’s account of itself. Next we have opposed an inspiration in which the inspired person is passive, and an inspiration which acts through the character of the sacred writer. But here there is no opposition. If God has formed the character as a vessel, He can use it so that the will should be in no exercise, and what sets the character in activity should be simply the Holy Ghost moving it, and it remaining as an instrument what it was, as I have no doubt was usually the case. There are different kinds of inspiration, as to form, recognized in Scripture, closely connected with this remark. I may speak the words willed by God, and not understand them, or I may understand and speak them. This last, though a less apparently inspired and glorious form, the Apostle prefers. But both were inspired. An example of one was tongues, or Old Testament prophecy; the other was prophecy under the New. So when the communication of the facts and ordinary knowledge of facts are contrasted, the contrast has no ground. The Spirit brought to their remembrance. It was the memory of things known when they had taken place, but recalled in the perfection proper to the mind of God to the memory of the inspired person, or, if needed, revealed if unknown. What I look for in inspiration is, that the words should be so ordered by the Spirit as to convey perfectly what it was the intention of the Spirit to communicate. Again, when an apostle spoke he was as inspired, when it was the intention of God he should be so, in speaking as in writing. When not, he was like another man speaking or writing—perhaps more spiritual—not necessarily so; but his words had no inspired authority. The writing was different in this,—it was to abide, and hence had a permanent character of inspiration. Although as to this Paul might have written uninspired, though spiritual letters, or not inspired for permanent use. But I shall show that the Apostles do pretend to inspiration, and affirm it of all Scriptures, that they distinguish between personal spirituality and inspired communications having the authority of the Lord.

After making all kinds of false logical divisions and confusions, so as to puzzle the reader, Mr. Jowett comes plainly to the point, and asserts—“Nor for any of the higher or supernatural views of inspiration is there any foundation in the Gospels and Epistles.” Now this is simply, totally and entirely false, an incredible statement; and slurs over the question of inspiration in a way I must call disingenuous. Because by saying Gospels and Epistles, the Old Testament is passed over in silence; and does it mean the Gospels and Epistles do not pretend to it themselves, or do not affirm it of Scripture? But it is false in any case. We read thus, “No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation; for prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost.”

Paul says, “Now the Spirit speaketh expressly (here we are in the New Testament) that in the last times some shall depart from the faith.” He declares that “all Scripture is given by inspiration of God.” It is proper to make the man of God perfect. The Old Testament writers are positive—"Thus saith the Lord," they say. And David, "The Spirit of the Lord spake by me, and His word was in my tongue;" and Christ, in spite of rationalists, declares they testify of Him, and that all must be fulfilled. He appeals to Scripture as an irrefragable and divine testimony, and declares in Luke xvi., that it bound the consciences of its readers as much as His own resurrection did. But St. Paul is more precise. He ascribes, in New Testament communication, first the revelation, next the communication, thirdly, the reception of divine truth, exclusively and absolutely to the direct operation of the Spirit. Thus only can it be, he says. "What man knoweth the things of a man, save the spirit of a man that is in him? Even so knoweth no one the things of God, but the Spirit of God." Next, "Which things also we speak, not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, communicating (such is the force) spiritual things by a spiritual medium." Then they are only so received. "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit . . . for they are spiritually discerned." He distinguishes between his experience, in which he had the Spirit acting in himself, and the revelation which made his communications the commandments of the Lord. "But I speak this by permission, not of commandment. Unto the married I command; yet not I, but the Lord. . . But to the rest speak I, not the Lord. Now concerning virgins, I have no commandment of the Lord; I give my judgment as one that has obtained mercy of the Lord to be faithful. But she is happier if she so abide after my judgment; and I think also that I have the Spirit of the Lord." Here then he distinguishes between his judgment, as to which he could yet appeal to them as having the Spirit to form and guide his experience, and a revelation from the Lord which constituted a commandment. Hence he says as to the body of his epistle not thus formally excepted, "If any man think himself to be a prophet or spiritual, let him acknowledge that the things that I write unto you are the commandments of the Lord." Some would allege from his saying, "I have no commandment," then all is not inspired. Yes, he was inspired, and modern attempts prove the immense importance of the precision of the God of grace, to point out the difference between the expression of his experience by the Spirit, and a revelation by the Spirit which had the direct force of a commandment. But as to the Gospels, Mr. Jowett pleads that their declaring the record to be true inasmuch as the writer saw that of which he spoke, is a proof that there is no inspiration. This is a mistake, the Lord had said the Spirit should bear witness of what they could not see, the heavenly glory of Christ; the disciples of His life, as they had been with Him. But for this last, that all might be according to the perfection of the Holy Spirit, He would bring to their remembrance what He had said. That is, the Holy Ghost reveals the heavenly glory of Christ and doctrine flowing from it, and calls to remembrance the earthly teaching of Christ, which they had already heard. The fitting the vessel in every way is no proof of the Lord's not using it Himself. When the Lord is tempted by Satan, he quotes the Scriptures as absolute authority against him, and Satan can make no reply to it at all. There cannot be a more unfounded or false assertion than that the Gospels or Epistles do not present the Old Testament and themselves as inspired. They formally claim inspiration both for Old and New. πασα γραφη θεοπνευστη, does not simply apply to the Old Testament. It is the assertion of the character of πασα γραφη; and in Rom. xvi. 26, prophetic writings (for that is the true force) are said to be means used for propagating the truth; and Peter in his Second Epistle refers to Paul's Epistles as Scriptures. Scripture is not an essay on inspiration. Nor does it in every Epistle or book set about to say I am inspired. It would be a proof that it was not, and feared people should say so; but, there are the most distinct testimonies, when the occasion occurs, that it is so. What can be stronger than saying —“ the Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the heathen by faith ?” It is treating the Scripture as if it were God Himself, because it is God’s own expression of His mind which Scripture gives ; the Lord Himself gives testimony to inspiration, and to the inspiration of Scripture, which is what rationalists deny : the referring to the New Testament merely is a subterfuge, and the New Testament gives the plainest declaration of the inspiration of the testimony by which Christianity was founded, and that the New Testament, as other Scriptures, are inspired.

W. I do not think it possible for any one reading the New Testament to call in question its inspiration.

H. Impossible. Where it does not speak of inspiration it gives its contents as definite revelation. I refer now to the Epistles. They speak of mysteries, that is, things known only to the initiated by revelation ; and speak of them avowedly as so given. Where Paul gives only his experience by the Holy Ghost, he states it to be different, as we have seen ; a large part of it is avowedly prophecy. And the apocalypse is revealed or an imposture. Some is said to be “ by the word of the Lord,” where it is a then given revelation ; and the most ordinary directions are said to be the Lord’s commandments. The Apostle Paul consequently took the greatest care, adding a salutation as a testimony that all was right. However, our present object is to consider Mr. Jowett’s essay, not to give a treatise on inspiration.

W. But how do you account for the details of human life and difference of style, and special occasions of writing the Epistles ?

H. It is just the perfection of the New Testament. The very essence of Christianity is God manifest in flesh. What is Divine clothed in all the details and entering into all the circumstances of human life. Of course the revelation partakes, and must partake, if it be a true one, of the nature and character of what it reveals. And this is what we find : first the connection of man with what is heavenly in Christ, which could be only known by revelation ; and thus the introduction of Divine principles into every part of human life. Under the old covenant God was hidden behind the veil, and sent out messages with, "Thus saith the Lord." There could not be the familiarity there is under the new. But though Christianity is infinitely higher, yet God is revealed. It has introduced God into this world in man, and man into heaven in Christ. This is unfolded in doctrine, the former specially by John, the latter by Paul ; and, while the latter makes the believer capable of drawing his principles from above, the former stamps its character on all his ways, and is given as the model of all our walk. Thus, in Phil. ii., also, you get Christ coming down, a pattern of our subjective state—our mind ; iii., of our activity and giving up all, through the objective power of the glory seen in Him—for the former no circumstance is too minute ; for Christ was perfect in all, from childhood to the cross. The latter makes every sacrifice light. All is dross and dung compared to it. The supposition of a promise given to the Apostles of guidance by the Holy Ghost in every respect for their service, and that what they most deliberately gave to the Churches was without it, is in itself a moral absurdity. Impossible that they should do so, impossible that God should allow it. This promise of the Comforter as their guide, and as managing all, is the characteristic feature of what Christ told them on going away. His last injunction was, they should not stir in their work till He was come, and they were endued with power from on high. Yet we are told that what was to guide the Church in all ages, and to be its sure safeguard in perilous times, was not given under this power.

W. It is utterly incredible. And while direct testimonies from Scripture prove the assertion of Mr. Jowett to be utterly false, it is well to see that it is as unnatural as it is untrue, and contrary to the whole method of Scripture.

H. Paul, too, remember, positively declares, in speaking of the mystery, that it was made known to him by revelation. We have seen he communicated it by words taught of the Holy Ghost. We will pass to other points of objection. Mr. Jowett declares that Paul was corrected by the course of events in his expectation of the coming Christ. For this there is not the smallest possible ground. At the extreme close of his career he urges Timothy to keep the commandment unrebukeably till Christ's appearing, which the only Potentate was to show in its own time; that is, he uses exactly the same language then as in his earliest epistle (1 Thess.) It was a time the Father had put in His own power. Of that day knew no one; but they were commanded to be always expecting the return of the Master. Paul never knew,—for it was not revealed; he always expected, for Christ had told men to do so, and made it the difference of the faithful and unfaithful servant; and the Spirit kept it alive in his soul. Christ had marked the Church's unfaithfulness, by the servants saying, "My Lord delayeth His coming." Into this Paul did not fall. The Lord at the same time prophetically declared that while the bridegroom tarried (no man knew how long) the virgins would slumber and sleep. He has tarried, and the early expectation of the Church has been lost. It went to sleep. Its wordliness and corruption and the loss of this expectation went on together. The midnight cry which awakes her is recalling her to this expectation. Mr. Jowett has not the expectation which brightened and animated the labours of Paul, and the course of events has more power over his mind than the words of Christ. The 2nd Peter tells us the blessed motive of the delay. God is not slack concerning His promise, but is long-suffering, not willing that any should perish. His long-suffering is salvation.

W. I see no ground at all for this assertion. It is a mere human comment imposed on Scripture, and evidently not drawn in any way from its contents. It has always seemed to me—for I have heard it elsewhere—mere ignorance of the Word and its principles—be those principles true or false. And it is quite evident that this expectation stamped its character on Paul's labours, and gave them an unworldliness wholly lost now, but which was no loss to him. The virgins got in somewhere to rest, and had to be called out again when the bridegroom was really coming.

H. Another objection to inspiration is drawn from the introduction to Luke. The statement of the fact, though not peculiar to Mr. Jowett, as little advanced by these Essayists is, is entirely unfounded. Luke does not say a word of setting forth in order a declaration of what eye-witnesses delivered. Others, Luke states, had done this, according to what eye-witnesses had delivered. As they had done this, he says that he who had παρηκολουθηκοτι ανωθεν πασιν ακριβως, had followed up accurately, had an intimate knowledge of everything from the very beginning, thought good to write to Theophilus that he might have certainty about them. That is, because the others were insufficient, he did it so as to give certainty. This remark, simple as it is, is as old as Origen, who refers to 'taken in hand' as a mere human undertaking in contrast with Luke. This is not a question in itself of inspiration, but of a suited instrument. But the statements made on this subject are the exact opposite of the truth. How Mr. Jowett can say that Matthew supposes Bethlehem to have been the dwelling-place of Joseph and Mary, I cannot tell. It is a pure fable. There is not a word of their dwelling-place, good or bad, nor allusion to it, nor a supposition of it. As regards other objections. In Luke we have a full account of the state of the godly remnant in Israel, a most perfect and lovely picture, the dominion of the Gentiles over Israel, but God's providential ordering of their political movements, to bring about His own designs announced in prophecy—the movement being arrested as soon as ever the design was accomplished. The genealogies are in perfect accordance with the design of each gospel. Luke, after the first two chapters, unfolds the character of Christ as Son of Man, and grace towards men; Matthew, the presentation of the Messiah Emmanuel to Israel, and His rejection, and the substitution of the Church and the kingdom for that people in their then standing before God. Hence Luke traces the genealogy to Adam; Matthew from David and Abraham. That men cannot explain them is very true. That may prove man's ignorance, but nothing as to the genealogies. They were available to those of that day directly; for us they rest on the authority of his word. Matthew does mention, in the most general way, the thieves blaspheming, because he is giving the extent of Christ's sufferings. The very thieves insulted Him, as I might say a mob attacked the queen and outraged her, though only two used insulting language. Luke, as is constantly the case with him, gives a full moral detail on a particular point. So he does as to the two at Emmaus; so as to Legion. It is possible that both thieves did; but not the least necessary to the account in Matthew. As to the narration of the woman's anointing the Lord's feet, it is a mistake. Mary's anointing at Bethany was evidently a wholly different occurrence.

Mr. Jowett speaks of a cycle of traditions, beyond which the tradition of the early fathers never travel, "though the world could not contain the books if all were written." And in these short narratives we ought to estimate the "accumulative weight" of the discrepancies. So of prophecy how far "the details were minutely fulfilled."

Now the fact that the early Fathers never travelled beyond these narratives, proves this, that beyond a written revelation they knew nothing about the matter. That all knowledge of the life of Jesus was confined to a written revelation,—a very important point in its nature, as proving, at the least, that the positive revelation about it was from the first so absolutely owned, to the exclusion of all else, that every other tradition dropped into oblivion at once. A pretended oral tradition really falls to the ground. This alone was owned and trusted from the beginning. These alleged traditions had no place at all in what was known ; and I think we may fairly say that this could not have been the case without the Divine will and power. A Divine account was to supersede, and did, all human accounts. There must have been such, and Papias tells us there were, and that his delight was to listen to eye-witnesses telling of them. Yet none appear. The apocryphal gospels are not worth referring to. The gospels were written apart from one another, probably at different epochs, yet with much of the same matter, and there is nothing at all outside them.

W. This is a striking fact, and, alleged as it is by Mr. Jowett, of weight in the inquiry as to discrepancies ; but I should be glad that you would say a little more on this point. The objections seem to me to have very little weight, and to prove, by their futility, rather the will to attack, than the difficulty of defence. But I should like a little more on this point in principle.

H. The details as to the gospels we will speak of in a moment. I will speak now of general principles. If a man write a book, he must have some design in doing it. And if a consistent man, he follows out that design. If God inspires one, He must have a design ; and He must follow it out perfectly : and this is stamped on every page of Scripture. In this perfectness all details will come in. Not that every detail has the same importance. If God is showing the whole relationship of God with man, and His dealings with man, I must get man as he is ; and I may get special dealings, not in the measure, or on the ground, of eternal truth, while I shall get the true light too. All this, as I have previously remarked, we have. It is only the stupidity of the objectors to suppose that all the things related or said are inspired. The wickedness and unbelief of man is largely set forth. That was not inspired by God. But the writers were inspired to give it, as it really was in truth, that I might have a true divinely given account of this state for my own heart and conscience. God may and has dealt specially with man in all patience. To know the real state of things I must have these dealings, or I shall know most superficially the human heart, and God's ways, and His love, and how the heart has been tested, and what it is under these tests. My moral knowledge will else be shallow. Now I have all this in Scripture, and the full light in the New Testament on them. Mr. Jowett is ignorant enough of the purport of Scripture thus to describe all this. "It (inspiration) is reconcilable with the mixed good and evil of the characters of the Old Testament, which nevertheless does not exclude them from the favour of God, with the attribution to the Divine Being of actions at variance with that higher revelation which He has given of Himself in the Gospel."

W. But I do not exactly see what that has to do with inspiration. Those of whom an inspired account speaks may be good or evil.

H. Of course they might. It has no more to do with it than the man in the moon. Nay, prophecy would, as to the greater part of it (we may indeed say all), have had no opportunity for its exercise if evil had not been there. It was the sustaining witness of God when evil was there. And just see the "nevertheless does not exclude them from the favour of God." What has that to do with inspiration? Supposing God sends an inspired message to one on whom His favour rests, but who is at the moment going astray. It shows patient grace, and no allowance of evil. But what is there in that which has to do with inspiration? It is utter blundering, and nothing more. The path which led to it is evident. It is this: he would show that if evil be there, there cannot be inspiration. It is an attempt to discredit Scripture by the fact of evil being there. But that is confounding the inspired word given about the evil, which rebukes it even, with the evil itself. What shows the animus of the passage is that the evil does not, according to the inspired book, exclude from God's favour. But if a mixed state of good and evil is to exclude from God's favour, every man in the world must be excluded from it. But the whole argument is a mere blunder, and a very stupid one. Inspired history is true history, and gives the evil as well as the good. A mere panegyric history would prove itself not inspired, like the legends of the saints, or a human biography. As to prophecy, it is constant, I may say, invective against evil. That the patience of God went on rising up early and sending them, till there was no remedy, Mr. Jowett, I regret to say, casts in God's teeth. I adore Him for it, as for all His goodness.

H. I thoroughly agree with you. I can hardly say I begin to think so. But this is a very excusable infirmity. But it seems more specious to say actions are attributed to God "at variance with that higher revelation which He has given of Himself in the Gospel." First, note the way Christian language is used; God has given a higher revelation of Himself in the Gospel. Is there a revelation without any inspiration? Don't let us dispute about the word. I prefer revelation—it is plainer. Is there a revelation without direct or inspired communications from God? If so, what is a revelation? Now God, in patient grace, did deal with men on lower grounds than the Gospel; put them under the schoolmaster up to Christ. But there was no contradiction in it. It took the ground of man's responsibility to God; and God dealt in partial temporal judgments, and even in cutting off the people, as showing the true result of being on this ground, which the Gospel fully confirms; though this way of dealing be not the Gospel. The former history was promise or law; the Gospel is neither. But perfectly consistent with and illustrating the excellency of both, while putting man on another ground, and that is, redemption, where the true light can fully shine, grace and heavenly blessing reign through righteousness. God's way of meeting man under promise, and, still more, His way of meeting man under law, must be different from His relationship with them under redemption ; but promise told the redemption would come, and law made the need of the redemption felt, by putting man on the ground of responsibility to God, so as to make redemption a far clearer and more felt thing, and God's goodness far more distinct and intelligible. But Mr. Jowett, who judges of all as one system, by his own thoughts and views, insists on the variance as if it was a contradiction, and hence all could not be Divine. It is about as much sense as if I should insist on the contradiction of a man's bringing seed, and putting it into a field, and then reaping it, and taking it all out. The truth is, I think I never met with a person who had bewildered himself in attempting to deal with Divine questions as Mr. Jowett has, and proved his entire ignorance of all God's ways by the judgment which, in his own strength, he has passed upon them. Think of a man writing an elaborate commentary or essay on the Romans (I say essay, for even in the notes it is the expression of his own thoughts explaining how the Apostle was governed in his expressions by local prejudices and habits of thought of his day ; from which, of course, Mr. Jowett is quite free) ; but think of his coming to this result— "Sin is not simply evil, but intermediate between evil and good, implying always the presence of God within."

W. What !

W. Well, but what can he mean ?

H. Well, it is the result of a man's reasoning from his own ideas to St. Paul's Epistles (of course believing that this higher revelation is not inspired), instead of learning from it, or even expounding it. He continues, "If we are surprised at St. Paul regarding the law— holy, just, and good as it was—as almost sin, we must remember that sin itself, if the expression may be excused, as a spiritual state, has an element of good in it." You know how indignantly the Apostle rejects the thought of law being so. But what shall we say of one coming to such a conclusion presenting himself as an interpreter of Paul, and an instructor of men how to interpret Scripture? "It was the nature of the law," he tells us, "to be good and evil at once."

W. But there must be some peculiar explanation of this?

H. He takes sin to mean the consciousness of sin, without this there can be no sin, and sin as the transgression of the law. But all this is blunder on blunder. He takes sin as guilt; hence sin is the consciousness of sin, i. e., sense of guilt. But sin is a very different thing from the sense of guilt; were it not, a perfectly hardened sinner could have no sin at all. But, besides, when he says sin is intermediate between good and evil, he is making the faculty which judges the sin the same thing as the sin it judges; that is, conscience, and not merely the actual consciousness of sin, but the sin we are conscious of, to be the same thing. In the next place, he confounds παραβασις νομον and ανομια as equivalent, a mere acceptance of traditional mistake about which he is so loud. Sin is the principle of self-will or lawlessness, which does not own God, and leads a man to gratify his own lusts without acknowledging any rein upon them. Mr. Jowett, too, makes all these blunders, referring specially to a chapter in which the Apostle speaks entirely otherwise of sin, namely, that it took occasion by the commandment to work lusts and become exceeding sinful. It was an active principle, as elsewhere a law of our nature. And again, having made the blunder of saying that sin is transgression of law, he makes the Apostle correct himself, as if he had said it was and then contradicted himself by saying that sin was in the world without law, by declaring (softening it down) that he meant it was not imputed. There can be no transgression when there is no law. What is there to transgress? But self-will and lust, lawlessness, there may be. It is the state of fallen man, only the law makes sin exceeding sinful. Every word in all he says is a blunder, not only as to St. Paul's meaning, but as to intellectual apprehension of moral truths. He has no idea of any such thing as truth. Hence Anselm has one set of ideas, the Schoolmen another, the Fathers another, Paul another, arising from his age, from which ours is different; so that our views of truth, i. e., what is truth for us must be different from what was truth for Paul, and Mr. Jowett clears it all up. Thus: "We acknowledge that there is a difference between the meaning of justification by faith to St. Paul and to ourselves. Eighteen hundred years cannot have passed away, leaving the world and the mind of man, or the use of language, the same it was." And the truth of God—the truth of this matter itself, if you please? It does not even occur to him there is or can be such a thing. The ideas of the day are really, for Mr. Jowett, the Christianity of the day. They are all that he can see. Not that he does not admit that other ages have clothed it in their own garb, but that he holds he is entitled to think Paul, in every respect, did so too. And this age, and these philosophical men, are capable of divesting it of mediæval and scholastic forms, and Pauline forms arising from his habits of thinking and apostolic conflicts with Judaism, and give it to us purified by modern philosophy. Such he declares is the task of modern interpretation. I cannot, of course, now pursue a critique of Mr. Jowett's volume on the Romans; but so entire a misconception of Paul's meaning and all moral truth, and all justness of thought, I could hardly have supposed possible in an intelligent person, as Mr. Jowett surely is. There is just activity of mind enough to make him blunder largely and livelily. "Who would speak," he asks, "of the unregenerate heart of Cæsar and Achilles?" . . . "Those who never heard the name of Christ, who never admit the thought of Christ, cannot be brought within the circle of Christian feelings and associations." Now, I do not touch on the doctrinal force of unregenerate, which is true of every one till he is regenerate. It is the excessive blundering of Mr. Jowett's mind. What have Christian feelings and associations to do with unregenerate? Cannot Christianity pronounce on the state of men outside its pale? Does it not do so? Is not a salvation sent into the world because of that state, to the consciousness of which, where effectual, it brings them? Is not the Epistle to the Romans an elaborate discussion of the state of the heathen and of the Jew, leading to the conclusion of the need of Christianity, of justification by faith, because of that state? Does it not declare that they that have sinned without law shall perish without law, and they that have sinned under law shall be judged by the law? Regeneration is not the aspect of Paul's doctrine as much as justification. But except a man be born again applies to Cæsar as it does to others. But the notion of Cæsar not being in the circle of Christian feelings, and hence not to be called unregenerate, involving as it does a denial of Christianity's pronouncing on his state, whatever it is, according to its feelings, is, especially in the Commentary on the Romans, as great a blunder as can well be conceived. It has no sense, because if he speaks of a heathen's not having Christian feeling, it is an absurdity; if he means that Christianity does not pronounce on the heathen state according to its feelings, it is, in commenting on the Romans, a greater absurdity still. It is founded on the proposition of Mr. Jowett's, that "the guilt of sin is inseparable from the knowledge of sin." But what even has that to do with holding a heathen to be unregenerate? All are unregenerate that are not regenerate. The question of guilt follows. I must say, he is the most inaccurate writer, morally and logically, I ever met with. That he should be ignorant of the communication of Divine life, so as to assert the impossibility of such contrasts, is too evident in the whole book to cause any surprise here.

W. It is a singular absence of all true moral apprehensions, and forces itself on one's notice in a commentary on a book which goes into all the depths of these apprehensions in the conscience.

H. You have a specimen of his way of judging of truth in the following, on Rom. v. 12: “[αμαρτια] Neither original sin, nor actual, nor the guilt of sin as distinguished from sin itself (for such differences had no existence in the Apostle’s age), nor like αμαρτημα, confined to the act of sin.” Think of a revelation being given of God, in order to give us the notions of the Apostle’s age, obscured by receiving the colour of each successive age for 1,800 years, and then only brought to light by what is the task of philosophy. I will add the explanation this philosophy gives: “αμαρτια describes sin rather as a mental state or in relation to the mind” (do you understand?). “It is often the power of sin, or sin collectively; sometimes, as here, a personification,” That gives the meaning of ‘sin entered into the world.’

H. Yet it seems the bent of his mind. We will return to the Essays. Of Scripture testimony to its own inspiration, and of the force of prophecy, we have spoken, and of imperfect presentations of truth. Presentations of moral relationship with God according to the responsibility of man, and the actual results of the fall, or the search after happiness “under the sun,” and of discipline when grace is not fully known, nor redemption revealed as accomplished, we do find in Scripture. But this is most gracious of God, and full of the deepest instruction. As to any opposition between that and Christianity, such a thought is only a confusion between man’s standing on his own responsibility, man in flesh as Scripture speaks, and grace meeting the consequences of all this by redemption, and so man in Christ. As to reconciling science and Scripture, Mr. Jowett’s next topic, I have spoken of it already. Let God be true and every man a liar. I deny the contradiction, abhor the principle of policy. Let us have the truth at all events. As to infidel theologians’ facts, admitted facts, I have learned to distrust them all. The long existence of the earth I have little doubt of.

Of man upon it I most certainly have. Mr. Jowett would give all up in fear, before it is proved, to have his own ideas of inspiration. I am not afraid. I see infidels repeating the notions and hypotheses of enemies of the truth as certain; and because they all take it for granted, declaring it is an admitted fact. They are the most unhistorical class I know, searching the least of all into facts. Strauss himself has declared that their objections to the gospels are utterly untenable, and therefore made a myth of it all; about as absurd as the other system, if once it is examined: indeed, it has died out. One proves that the second of Luke, if by the same author as the first, must have also had lyric poems in it, as the disciples praised God; the first therefore is certainly a poetical morsel tacked on, being written by another. And this is by no means to be counted an extreme example.

W. This habit of making their assumption that prophecies, miracles, &c., cannot be true, and judging of all according to their own notions to prove they are not true, is too constant and of too gross a character to need your saying much more about it. None can have read any of these statements without noticing this. Daniel's prophesying of Antiochus Epiphanes, is the proof as we have seen, that his prophecy is spurious; because there cannot be a prophecy, and the writer must have lived then. Then he becomes in their language the Maccabean Daniel, and all is settled. And the English come, and, credulous as our nation is, and apt to think others wiser than itself, all passes for gospel with them.

H. But Mr. Jowett, inconsistent as he is, adopts this petitio principii, which, starting from the assumption that prophecy is impossible, proves thereby that those that pretend to be prophets are not. He complains that Isaiah's mentioning Cyrus is not taken, as it would be in another book, as a proof that it must have been written after his time, which is simply the a priori argument that there cannot be a prophecy. We must continue a little with some further details, as they harass the mind when passed over. Mr. Jowett quietly takes for granted, leaves it to be supposed, that if Schleiermacher has spoken of discrepancies in the narrative of the infancy, it is all true, and we must turn to what is called setting free by the truth to escape it, but let inspiration down to a nullity. And that is what is done, but nothing said about it. Now, I deny altogether these discrepancies. If I admit traditions as to the infancy as told by Matthew, there may be; but in the gospels there are none,—only the account in Matthew is so brief, or rather, there being no account of Jesus's birth at all, the circumstances narrated by Luke have no chronological place in Matthew. Mr. Jowett refers to the natural meaning of "Why are they then baptized for the dead?" Now, the natural way of knowing what a person means is to pay attention to what he says. You may remark that verses 20—28 form (what Paul is singularly fond of, and what Mr. Jowett more singularly objects to in his commentary—one would say really with the object of making all obscure—that is) a parenthesis, and 29 refers to 18, and 30, &c., to 19. Baptizing is, in the nature of Christianity, baptizing unto death; and the case of those filling up the ranks, as has been said, when some were actually dead, is referred to as showing the folly of the whole Christian course, if there was no resurrection. The dead had perished; the living were the most miserable of all men. Whatever should men become Christians for, or jeopard their lives, if it were thus? At any rate, Mr. Jowett leaves us to divine what true interpretation would afford us. If he refer to a subsequent superstition of baptizing over dead bodies, it is a gross anachronism, and unworthy of Christianity; but that is no matter for a rationalist. It is an objection, and that is everything, though they are as much in the dark as others. The difficulty as to "This generation shall not pass away," is a prejudice flowing from the English use of the word generation. It is quite as much used for a moral class in Scripture, as for the period marked by human life; and if Deut. xxxii. 5, 20, where this very subject is treated of, be referred to, the sense is plain. And here we have a minute and most striking fulfilment. The generation is not passed away. The Jews remain a perpetual witness that there are other thoughts in Scripture than those of rationalists; an objective fact, witnessing to God's government of the world according to the words of the prophet and of the Lord. As to "Upon this rock I will build my Church," you will ever find rationalists favouring popery, because they are indifferent to truth, and dislike Scripture. Christ does not declare He will build His Church on Peter, but gives that name to him, "a stone"—for so it is; because, in his confession, he had a part in the power of that truth on which He would build it,—not that He was the Messiah, not Son of God, King of Israel, but what only Simon had confessed, and the Father had revealed to him, that Jesus was the Son of the living God. This, proved in resurrection, was the basis of the Church of God. All this side Christ's grave was, save Christ Himself, in death's power—and He willingly put Himself there. But as Son of the living God, He could not be holden of it. And he who had his seat in the gates of Hades had no power over what was passed beyond his realm and dominion. Resurrection of Christ's person, in whom the power of it (and righteousness of it too) was, was the overthrow of and beyond the power of Satan, and laid the foundation of the Church—Christ's person as Son of the living God. That could not be held by death. Hence Peter clings to this word in his Epistle: "He hath begotten us again to a living hope." Christ is the living stone to whom we come, and come as living stones. As to Phil. ii. 6, I believe it to be a contrast with the first Adam, and a magnificent one. I do not desire to rest the argument on "thinking it no robbery." The word is a very difficult one indeed,—never used, I believe, elsewhere; its form may be active, and not the object or thing done. The force I believe to be, he did not do as Adam, who, when in the form of man, sought as a robbery, a booty to be acquired, to be equal with God; but, being in the form of God, emptied Himself of the glory He had. It does suppose Christ to be in the state of Godhead, as Adam in the state of a man; but the special force of the proof does not rest in the word "robbery," as contrasted with "booty," or object of robbery—for that is the only question in the passage, because it is απαγμων, not απαγμα. As to Rom. iii. 25, Mr. Jowett rests on his statement in his own commentary, in which he follows De Wette and Meyer, and still more Winzer, and translates through faith, by his blood. I do not see what he gains by it; he grounds the translation on faith in not being used, which is a simple mistake which a concordance would have rectified. If a man is justified by faith, by his blood, I suppose the blood of Christ must be efficacious to justify him—as, indeed, is expressly said—and his faith in it is right. But faith "in" is used. The words, "faith in His blood," are not found elsewhere; but "justified by His blood," "redemption through His blood," so as to present its efficacy as the subject-matter of faith, is often found. His gloss on Gal. iii. 26, seems to me an utterly false interpretation. His allegation is, that "faith, like all other Christian states, is often spoken of as existing in Christ." I am not quite sure what this lucid phrase means,—whether it is that Christ had faith, or whether Mr. Jowett refers to the general expression "in Christ," as a position in which anything was realized. At all events, Gal. iii. 26, cannot be interpreted in either way. "We are all the children of God through faith in Christ Jesus," seems to me as plain as possible. 2 Tim. i. 13, may be taken as characteristic as a position: "Faith and love which are in Christ Jesus." 2 Tim. iii. 15, is clearly faith in Christ Jesus, so is, beyond all question, Eph. i. 15, and Col. i. 4; and, if Tischendorf is to be believed, John i. 15, which however may be doubted. Fritsche, whose commentary has been called a Greek grammar, insists that on grammatical grounds there is no foundation for the assertion. Doctrinally I could have no objection; the word his own would incline me to connect εν τω αυτου αιματι with ιλαστηριον. Αυτου is emphatic, and a propitiation in [the power of] His own blood, [and that] through faith is perhaps clearer than faith, in His own blood. Were αυτου after αιματι, I should be disposed to take it as in our English translation. But the ground Mr. Jowett takes is untenable, and the use of it here as any perversion quite unfounded. There is nothing to struggle for. Nor in Rom. xv. 6. The God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ is the well-known expression of Scripture, as putting us so blessedly in the same place with Himself in John xx. In Eph. i., where the blessings to be referred to each name are distinguished in 4 and 5. And the prayer of chap. i. founded in one name; of iii. in the other. I do not think these complaints quite free from being disingenuous. As to 1 John v. 7, it needs no remark; and as to 1 Tim. iii. 16, it is a question of criticism which orthodox and rationalists have alike discussed, perhaps both with prejudices. As to Rom. ix. 5, it is certain all the Fathers took it as said of Christ, all the Reformers, and the vast majority of moderns; and, as far as I am aware, Erasmus first proposed the change. The moderns, who wish it otherwise, do so on doctrinal grounds. So Meyer, Fritsche, Tischendorf, Wetstein, and others. De Wette declares nothing satisfactory. Holding the Deity of the Lord Jesus as the foundation of all my faith, the usual punctuation of a full stop after κατα σαρκα seems to me to have no sense. And if all do not refer to Christ, I should set the stop after 'over all,' Of whom as concerning the flesh Christ came, He who is over all things, God [be] blessed for ever. Amen. I rather think Erasmus spoke of this too, but cannot exactly say. This stopping leaves the question undecided. It depends on the insertion of [be]. All these attempts to throw discredit on ordinary interpretation have an evident animus. And Mr. Jowett and his companions have not left it to nice criticism on passages, admitted to be difficult, to have their orthodoxy called in question. This part of Mr. Jowett's argument I leave. No one wishes to hinder sound critical inquiry into the reading or interpretation of the text.

H. Clearly so: I turn briefly to another point. These interpreters have created an immense difficulty for themselves, partly incident to their position, but more connected still with their doctrine. Denying the distinction of the regenerate, of the Church, of what Scripture calls saints, this being for them only a forced and unnatural position of Christianity, and then all the world being, by an effort of imagination, christianized, they seek to apply the precepts of Christianity to civil society. Hence I read "the frame of civilization, that is to say, institutions and laws, the usages of business, the customs of society; these are for the most part mechanical, capable only in a certain degree of a higher and spiritual life. Christian motives have never existed in such strength as to make it possible to entrust them with the preservation of social order." Moral light Christianity has, I admit, brought in; it has, I admit, acted beneficially on society. Men do not do in the light what they do in the dark. But what the spiritual life of usages of business is would be hard to tell. But what is the result? Christianity is taken as a kind of essence, an infusion, which is to influence men; and followers of Christ disappear. "Are its maxims to be modified by experience, or acted on in defiance of experience? Are the accidental circumstances of the first believers to become a rule for us? . . . That can hardly be, consistently with the changes of human things." Now that you cannot frame politics on Christianity I do not deny. It is felt to be impossible; but Mr. Jowett concludes, not that the Christian is to abide by what is properly Christian, but "our Lord Himself has left behind Him words which contain a principle large enough to admit all the forms of society or life. My kingdom is not of this world ;" a singular proof of it, that because it is not of it at all, it admits them all. What means, 'admits them'? Does it mean, has common principles with them all? That cannot be. Is exclusively one? That it is not. It directs obedience to human authorities as of God. Or is it, that it has its own directions for its true followers, not the letter perhaps, but its own guidance for those who follow Christ as pilgrims and strangers, gives a Divine path through the world, guiding in all real common duties, but giving a heavenly path through them? "If ye live in the Spirit, walk in the Spirit." "If any man serve me, let him follow me; and where I am, there shall also my servant be." "Whatsoever ye do in word or deed, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus." Is it spiritual direction for those who are strangers and pilgrims, declaring plainly that they seek a country; or an arrangement to have an inward life, and do at Rome as they do at Rome?

W. I cannot doubt for a moment that Christ has left us an example that we should follow His steps; and that the precepts of the New Testament form and guide our path: that he who loves God keeps His commandments—and that they are not grievous, for he that is born of God overcometh the world; and all that is in the world is not of the Father. Alas! I feel I come very short, but I cannot doubt an instant that the principles you refer to, if I have rightly understood them (and in reading the Essays this part struck me as giving a key note to much, I mean the mingling Christianity with the world, swamping it in it), are distinctive of all that is heavenly, of all that is Christian, all that lifts the whole spirit of a man out of the wretched motives of self and the world into Christ's motives. I am persuaded that it is this which has destroyed the testimony of Christianity in the world. Men, alas, thinking of self too, have put out almost the light under the pretext of winning men to look at it.

But we have lost our own joys, and dimmed the witness to Christ by it.

H. I am glad to hear you say so. We are, alas! short, very short; but it is well in such a matter to have a fixed principle of conduct. Mr. Jowett having shown the impossibility of framing society on Christian principles, Christ's kingdom being not of this world, then lets down individual Christianity in this way—“It is a counsel of perfection, and has its dwelling-place in the heart of man. . . .” “That is the answer to a doubt which is also raised respecting the obligation of the letter of the Gospel on individual Christians. But this inwardness of the words of Christ is what few are able to receive.” So, in result, you have the words of Christ inward in the heart, and all forms of society and of life admitted, because Christ's kingdom is not of this world, so we are not to bring it into it. It is a comfortable mysticism which by professing to have the words inwardly, can have any form of life and worldliness outwardly. Now I admit the letter kills. We have the spirit of power, of love, and of a sound mind. But this is merely the denial of the authority of Scripture in the largest sense—“be not conformed to this world.” I would arrest your attention a moment on another passage here, as very deeply characteristic of the low ground on which all these reasonings rest. Mr. Jowett complains of the “extraordinary and unreasonable importance attached to single words . . . divorce, marriage with a wife's sister, inspiration, the personality of the Holy Spirit, infant baptism, episcopacy, divine right of kings, original sin.” Now really a person must have been in a very singular school to give such a list. Lightness in divorce is an abomination in the sight of God; and in my judgment marriage with a wife's sister is the destruction of the free happiness of families. Episcopacy and infant baptism have their importance through their connection with more general truths. Kings have a divine right as long as God keeps them on the throne. That is, they have, however they get there, their power from God. But to mix up these subjects with inspiration, the personality of the Holy Ghost, and original sin, shows an absence of the spiritual element truly remarkable. If there be no inspiration, I have no communication from God; the greatest privilege I can have on earth; the only thing that puts me, in a sure and Divine way, in relationship and intercourse with God. The personality of the Spirit is perhaps the most practically important truth, the most characteristic of Christianity, not as foundation, but, as to state and power, of all in Scripture; and original sin, whatever view we may have of it, the foundation question of all man's relationship with God. And these Mr. Jowett casts in with episcopacy, and questions, serious no doubt in detail, but some of mere forms of thought. Instead of rising above his age, he is immersed, and, as to his mind, the divinest truths with him, in the comparatively petty questions which absorb the attention of the narrow circle in which he moves. I do not charge him with design in it, but singular narrowness. If he had said, See what they have reduced Christianity to, questions of forms of Church government, and divorce, and ordinances, I should have understood him, though he would have found assailants; but he reduces Christianity to this level, for he puts that on which as a present thing Christianity rests (for redemption is the foundation), questions as to our alienation in nature from God, the reality of blessed communications from God Himself, and His living personal presence with us, on the same footing, in the same category of importance, as episcopacy and the marriage of a wife's sister.

W. It is surprising. But I think it shows he does not believe himself in any of these things; he could not class them thus if he did.

H. Surely, he does not. We have already heard what he says as to inspiration, and we will look at what he says as to the others. But let us note for ourselves:—If there be no inspiration, there is no communication from God which is from Himself, which is the communication of God's mind from and by God, which gives to man's intelligence Divine thoughts, to his heart the witness that God delights to give them to him. All that has enlarged the intelligence, fed the heart, sustained the faith of all that have trusted God in all ages, and in all forms of Church government; what has marked the spiritual tone of every divinely taught and spiritually elevated mind is gone. And they know, the poorest and most ignorant believer (I do not say Mr. Jowett) knows what he means by inspiration. He could not define it perhaps, does not know what define means, but he knows that he has communications from God in which his soul drinks of living water, a Word of God, sharper than any two-edged sword, discerning the thoughts and intents of the heart; he eats the words of God, as Jeremiah says, and they are the joy and rejoicing of his heart. They have an authority over him which he delights to obey; reproofs, if needed, his heart bows to; promises his faith leans on; a Saviour revealed whom his soul loves; and all this because he receives it with a divine faith as inspired, as God's Word, as God's having condescended, taken pains, shall I say, to speak to him for every want here, and the brightness of heavenly hopes hereafter. He has seen his Saviour quoting them as authority, using them to repel Satan; the Apostles proving the truth by them, or declaring that their own words were God's commands: he takes them as all this, and there is constant intercourse between God and his soul. Mr. Jowett will quibble on θεοπνευστης, and quibble wrongly. I deny that 2 Tim. iii. 16 is spoken of the Old Testament. It is carefully worded, so as to leave no pretence for such a statement. Πασα γραφη θεοπνευστη. Whatever comes under the title γραφη it applies to, is meant to apply to. The Scriptures were held then to be a character of writing which had irrefragable authority, could not be broken. Holy men had spoken as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. They had not come of the will of man. Whatever was that, had Divine authority. Before Christ there was only the Old Testament, of course. Mr. Jowett at least has owned the New Testament to have this character, has owned that the Lord has caused all holy Scripture to be written for our learning. St. Paul speaks of the comfort of the Scriptures. Our inquiry here is not what books belong to it, but, whether prophetic Scriptures are a blessed communication from God Himself to men. Does Christ treat them so Himself, use them so, declaring from them, and for Himself, that men live of every word that comes out of the mouth of God? Does He obey them, fulfil them, declare that they must be fulfilled, all that is written in them concerning Him? Was it what man had invented or God had revealed that was to be fulfilled? Have words proceeding out of the mouth of God no hold on Mr. Jowett's heart? Does he mean to say that the New Testament is not holy Scripture which God has caused to be written for our learning? If so, πασα γραφη θεοπνευστη. It is inspired. He has declared more than once, I believe, that the New Testament is holy Scripture. I know in the estimation of Essayists subscriptions are elastic things, and conscience as to them still more so. However that may be, those who have found words out of the mouth of God full of grace and truth to their souls cling to them as the tokens, and precious and profitable tokens, of God's love. They have seen the Apostle carefully distinguishing his own spiritual experience and his authoritative communication of the Divine mind. And they believe, as Mr. Jowett professes to believe, that the New Testament is Scripture, and hence, that it is θεοπνευστη divinely inspired, and they have no doubt what that really means for them. They have the words that came out of the mouth of God. They believe St. Paul when they hear him saying, that what he had been taught by the Holy Ghost he has communicated not by words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the Holy Ghost teacheth, and they bless God for so infinite a treasure. If Mr. Jowett has it not, does not believe it, they pity him. He has lost what is the greatest treasure, communications of God Himself to their souls.

W. Oh! how I agree with you, one feels one has to do with God; and whether it be for comfort, the strength flowing from feeling such an One's mind guiding you when weak and beset, or the joy it gives when the mind is free; the way it suits our weakest, aye, our worst moments, and yet in our most elevated reaches out beyond all our thoughts with Divine fulness, one learns daily more it is the Word of God. It makes me think of the words of the Apostle as the revelation of what he is there speaking of the fulness of, "that being rooted and grounded in love, we may be able to comprehend with all saints, the length and breadth, and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that we may be filled with all the fulness of God." A largeness which he cannot go out into, a nearness of that love, known, and yet which passes knowledge, leading the heart, rooted and grounded in love, into all the fulness of God. Surely, he is speaking of the things themselves, but what reveals it but the Word? Can man do it?

H. Well, we will leave this, to use it through grace, as our own resource in daily life, and turn to the second point which Mr. Jowett seeks to sink as far as possible.

W. The personality of the Spirit?

H. Yes. Here, as wherever there is spirituality, our Essayists are utterly at a loss. Surely we are all most poor in these things, without any false modesty in saying it. But I do not mean that. They have not the thing to be poor in. "In the fourth example the words are mysterious (John xiv. 26; xvi. 15), and seem to come out of the depths of a Divine consciousness." Now, what does that mean?

W. Well, I really do not know. All Christ's words came out of the depths of a Divine consciousness.

H. Surely they did; but, coupled with mysterious, it intimates, I apprehend, that they are unintelligible. It is added, remark, "They have sometimes, however, received a more exact meaning than they could truly bear. What is spoken in a figure is construed with the severity of a logical statement." It is thus mysterious, not of the supposed exact meaning, cannot bear it, and spoken in a figure. Thus the immense and all-important fact of the presence of a Divine person, who is sent, wills, distributes, comes, guides, teaches, is God, who is lied against, is all a figure. And this is the more pointed, because in the quoted passage He was another Paraclete, who was to take the place of the Son of God personally with them on earth. Now that, if a Divine person dwell in us, so that our bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost, He should work in a power and influence difficult to express in a single form of words; that He will be a source of thoughts and feelings which are ours, and yet His, so that expressions necessarily vary, to get the whole of the truth, I fully admit. It must be so. That this effect will be spoken of as the Spirit, and the Divine person who produces it as the Spirit apart from the effect, is the natural consequence of His working in us when present. And Scripture so speaks; but it unfolds, develops, and does not weaken the truth of the Divine presence. It makes power, but not a figure of it. Thus I find, "He who searcheth the hearts," that is, me, "knows what is the mind of the Spirit;" there it is the effect that is wrought by it; "for He maketh intercession for the saints according to God;" there it is the Spirit personally. This Scripture largely teaches; but it does not make a figure of so great a truth. These, for Mr. Jowett, are passages "of an opposite tenor." Now, the xiv., xv., xvi. chapters of John are specially occupied with the truth of the Comforter's coming when Christ went away. It is after unfolding what Christ was in the world, to the end of chapter vii., and the rejection of His word, in chapter viii., and of His work, in chapter ix.; the witness given to His being Son of God, Son of David, Son of Man, in xi., xii., and the washer of His people's feet whom He had cleansed, that they might have a part with Him on high, in xiii. (the great subject which follows on His going away); after declaring, in the beginning of xiv., that there was place for them on high, and He would come again and fetch them there; that they knew where He was going—for He was going to the Father; and they had seen the Father in Him, and they knew the way; for in coming to Him they came to the Father,—He proceeds to tell them the great blessing of their position while He was away; and this was His obtaining another Comforter, the Holy Ghost, whom His Father would send on His going away, and who would bring to their remembrances what He had said when living; and then in xv., whom He would send from the Father, so that He would bear witness as well as themselves; and thus His heavenly glory, which they did not know, would be known. In the xvi. He unfolds all the Comforter would do when He came; first, as to the world, and then as to them. Now, in this we have the plain, however momentous declaration, that as He, the Son, had been with them bodily, so another Comforter, the Holy Ghost, would be with them when He went—they would not be left alone. And the difference is distinctly put as to how He could be known in the world. The world did not see Him or know Him, and hence could not receive Him. The world ought, at least, to have received Christ; but there was no question of its receiving the Holy Ghost. He was given to them that believe (John ever speaks individually, not of the Church); with the disciples He could abide (which Christ as He then was could not), and would dwell in them (Christ had only dwelt with them). And thus they would know Him. Now, this does confine the true knowledge of the Holy Ghost to those in whom He dwells. That He wrought in special service, to render the disciples competent witnesses, is most precious, but no figure. It makes us know what inspiration is, and how, while eye-witnesses, they were divinely competent to be so. They were human witnesses, but their record Divine and witnesses by the Holy Ghost. This is what a person, who denies anything supernatural in inspiration, of course must make "a figure" of, "not take exactly"! All that, we understand, understand it well; but it is because it is too plain, that, by those who deny inspiration, it is said to be mysterious and a figure (just as Strauss, because he saw the folly of rationalism, but would not believe, made the whole history of the gospels a myth)—not because it is not plain. Of course one verse does not exhaust the subject; but we are speaking of the verse referred to by Mr. Jowett. Can anything be plainer, however solemn and blessed, than this,—“But the Comforter, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance whatsoever I have said unto you;” that is, all Divine truth and needed remembrance of Christ’s living words? I have only to believe it, and all is plain. I do believe it. I believe when Christ went up on high, the Father did send the Holy Ghost in Christ’s name, that He did teach the Apostles, and bring what Christ had said to their remembrance, and that they acted, and taught, and witnessed of Christ, by this power. What means a figure here? Did not Christianity spread by this means? Is not, in the Acts, the presence of this Comforter the salient fact which stamps its character on all their proceedings? That the Spirit wrought in a new life, was a Spirit of adoption, made men to abound in hope, shed the love of God abroad in believers’ hearts, and ministered a thousand other blessings, is most true. A Christian’s career is designated by walking in the Spirit. But the passage we are considering is plain enough to those that understand, to those that believe. In John xvi. 15, it is another side of the Holy Ghost’s work, but the same truth. The Holy Ghost reveals to believers (His work in the world had been spoken of), the glory and riches of Christ—not merely recalling what He had said on earth, or leading unto truth. All things the Father has are Christ’s (it was not as if Christ, or the Father, had some independent things); hence the Holy Ghost takes of what is His, and shows it. And, as the Father was known in the Son on earth, so the fulness of all that belongs to the Father, is known as the Son's now He is in heaven by the Holy Ghost's teaching. Depth surely there is; but the passage is plain enough. You may remark how the blessed Persons in the Trinity are associated in both cases, i. e., of Christ on earth and Christ in heaven. The Holy Ghost comes, and "My Father and I will come and make our abode with Him." When Christ, as Son, was working miracles on earth, the Father that was in Him did the works, and He cast out devils by the Spirit of God. They are distinct, yet cannot be separated. Now that, on such subjects, we are in Divine depths is most true; but the passages we are referring to are most simple and plain. They affirm the coming of the Comforter, and what He was to do; and He came and did it, and He abides in true Christians who thus know Him, and with the true Church for ever.

W. It is simple. What we want is to believe it more. There is very little faith in the presence of the Holy Ghost.

H. Alas! there is not: yet it is appealed to so distinctly as a known thing in Scripture, as to make us ashamed. The Apostle, in speaking of such a thing as fornication, says: "Know ye not that your bodies are the temples of the Holy Ghost which ye have of God?" So to the Galatians, who were in a sad state, he asks, "How did you get the Holy Ghost?" On that there was no obscurity. So as a motive to avoid evil and the measure of it: "Grieve not that Holy Spirit of promise with which ye are sealed for the day of redemption." So: "Hereby know we that we dwell in Him (God) and He in us, because He has given us of His Spirit." It ought to be an elementary point of faith, that the Holy Ghost dwells in the Church and in the true Christian. These two truths, on which Mr. Jowett casts all the slur and dimness he can, are the hinges of the whole condition of the Church and of the individual saint. The Word of God and the Spirit of God. In the first alone we have the mind of God: in the second alone spiritual understanding, and power; and so, as John tells us, fellowship—wondrous word!—with the Father and the Son, the living objects of daily faith. May we be found here simple and dependent “as newborn babes.”

W. It is very hard to be simple.

H. It is in itself perfection; true simplicity is forgetfulness of self. And there is only one way to arrive at it, for it is, as all spiritual life, a matter of overcoming, and that way is being much with God, and God known in grace, because then self, which is the opposite of simplicity, dies down, so to speak.

W. I am sure it is the way. Nothing replaces that communion; and then there is a perception of Divine power and enlargement which is not found anywhere else. Our eyes see, as Peter (negatively) expresses it, afar off. We are not μυωπαζοντες. But pursue your subject.

H. The next point is, original sin. Now, I have no love for scholastic terms: I prefer Scripture ones infinitely. But I do not want to lose things in getting rid of words. Mine may be no better. We are all by nature the children of wrath. Mr. Jowett speaks thus of it: “The justice of God who rewardeth every man according to his works, and the Christian scheme of redemption, has (have) been staked on two figurative expressions of St. Paul, to which there is no parallel in any other part of Scripture” (1 Cor. xv. 22; Rom. v. 12). The first has really nothing, or only in an indirect way, to do with it. The second is an elaborate statement on the subject. But to say that there is no parallel in Scripture, if the doctrine and not the form be referred to, is to ignore all vital truth in it. The history of the Bible is the history of original sin. The doctrine of the Bible is the doctrine of God’s putting it away for ever.

W. You must explain yourself a little.

H. I will. Does not the history of our race (I do not say our creation) begin with the declaration that Adam, fallen and driven out from God, begat a son in his image after his likeness, the fruit being shown in sin against his brother, as Adam's sin had been against God, and so death being actually brought into the world, but the death of the pious, marking the predominance of evil?

W. It does.

H. That is the early history of original sin—sin attached to our origin and so in our nature. Further: when the Flood had swept away the insupportable violence and corruption of the world, and the world began again in Noah, in whom rest was given concerning the work of men's hands, and the curse taken so far off the ground, did he not turn the blessing into drunkenness, he to whom government had been entrusted, and shame and a son's wickedness inaugurate the new career of man?

W. Yes.

H. This is the history of original sin. Did not man then sink, what there is no appearance of his doing before, into idolatry, having built a tower to establish his own will?

W. True.

H. This too is. The form of the world in nations and peoples is founded on it. God then called out Abraham from the midst of this idolatry, and, after a lapse of some 400 years, so that a people should be formed, brings them out of Egypt with a high hand, leads them to Sinai to give them His law, the rule of life for a child of Adam. What did they do before they had time to get it graven on stone, though they had heard the voice of God out of the midst of the fire?

H. Such, then, is man according to the history of the Bible: and so you will find it throughout. Before the consecration of Aaron and his sons was over, Nadab and Abihu had offered strange fire and were slain, and Israel, responsible under the priesthood, closed its history by the Ark's being taken, and judgments coming on the priesthood itself in Eli: so that the whole system was closed, for without the Ark there was no regular association with God at all. God interfered by a prophet, but that was sovereign grace. When the royalty was established Solomon fell into idolatry; and at last Lo-ammi, not my people, was written on the chosen people of God, where He had set His name that it might be owned in the midst of the universal corruption and idolatry of the world, and where grace and warning had dealt "till there was no remedy." When God set up a head of Gentile power in Nebuchadnezzar, he sets up an idol and persecutes the saints, and the whole series of these monarchies take the character of unintelligent ravenous beasts. But chief and last of all (save special mercy on His intercession), when God declared; "I have yet one Son, it may be they will reverence my Son when they see Him," when they saw Him what did they do?

W. They said, "This is the heir; come, let us kill Him, and the inheritance shall be ours."

H. They had then "no cloak for their sin." "They had both seen and hated both Him and His Father." There was a reprieve through His intercession on the cross, and the Holy Ghost (that figure of Mr. Jowett's) announced a glorified Christ, and the open door of repentance, but they would not go in. They closed the history of man with this word of judgment; "Ye do always resist the Holy Ghost, as your fathers did so do ye." A judged world, a broken law, persecuted prophets, the slain Just One, a resisted Spirit, sum up the history of man, the history of original sin. Man must be born again.

H. It is, and ought to be brought home to one's own heart, in which it is all morally true. But it brings this comfort with it, that it shows the new blessing brought in by the second Adam to be itself entirely apart from the corrupt first Adam, though moral intelligence be brought out by their conflict, and the need of God's grace be surely found in it. But Christianity has its basis in resurrection after the work of redemption; that is, a passage into a wholly new state after God's perfect goodness, and His righteousness too, had been proved as to the old.

W. It is a glorious thing, Christianity. One sees it is Divine when once we know it. It is deplorable this effort to shut us down into the first Adam.

H. In truth it is. And that is what one feels in reading the works of all these rationalists when one has the new man. One finds also one's dependance on God in their reasonings; for the vast and Divine largeness of Scripture, full of thoughts which can be only Divine, is not their field of view at all, nor the richness and fulness which a divine person and a new creature gives to it. You might as well talk of a beautiful view to a blind man. The blending of all the richness of lights and shadows, the striking features, and soft distances, and enlivened details, do not exist for their faculties at all, nor faculties to apprehend them. So speaks the Lord Himself—"Why do ye not understand my speech, because ye cannot hear my word." And so the Apostle—"The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit; they are foolishness to him." One cannot but answer their statements as the Lord—"If he called them gods to whom the words of God came," he shows them their injustice on their own ground. Still by the word: I have deeply felt in what we have been searching into, the absolute impossibility of meeting unbelieving objections by this depth and riches of Scripture, which to a believer carries the absolute evidence of their divinity. Paul sums up the great truth in saying, "we are all the children of wrath;" and then, "but God who is rich in mercy, for His great love wherewith He has loved us, when we were dead in sins, has quickened us together with Christ;" "we are risen together,"

“created again in Christ Jesus :” and this makes death and resurrection the great topic of the epistles—“Reckon yourselves to be dead indeed unto sin, and alive to God through Jesus Christ.” So Peter, though less fully and elaborately, “We are begotten again to a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead;” “and as Christ has suffered in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind.” Am I not right in saying that the history of the Bible is the history of original sin, of one who had to confess, if he knew himself, “Behold, I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin did my mother conceive me”? Accompanied by marvellous long-suffering and gracious dealings, but which only brought out this sin, till, the tree having been digged about and dunged, it was proved no care could make a bad tree bring forth good fruit, and the Lord says, “Now is the judgment of this world.” “The world seeth me no more.” But this only to bring in redemption, and set man on a wholly new footing, beyond evil and in the glory of God. So that it should be said: “When we were in the flesh,” “but ye are not in the flesh.” And this true and Divine dealing with our nature, according to the revelation of God, is what is fully brought out in the Romans; and hence, deserved condemnation, atonement, death, and resurrection. Indeed, in doctrine it goes no further, not on to the ascension, because it is laying the great moral ground, of sin, and putting it away, in guilt and power alike; and man’s acceptance with God on a new footing. It only once just states the result of ascension as a final fact in the chain. The passages referred to by Mr. Jowett are merely summing up the great universal truth in Scripture in the two heads of the respective races, so to speak, of carnal and spiritual life. But the same truth is insisted on once and again, as in the passages I have quoted. So in experience. “I know that in me, that is in my flesh, dwelleth no good thing.” “The flesh is not subject to the law of God, neither, indeed, can be.” “It lusts against the Spirit.” “They that are in the flesh cannot please God." "I am crucified with Christ, nevertheless I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." I suppose this is "Oriental" for Mr. Jowett. But, if so, his heart is following its own imaginings, and he does not know it. God has not said in vain, "All the imaginations of his heart are only evil, and that continually;" and this said too in grace: "I will no more curse the ground for man's sake, for the imaginations," &c. It was not merely the previous wickedness of the antediluvians. They were gone. It was His motive for dealing with the race no more in that way. So the Lord, "Out of the heart of man proceed evil thoughts, adulteries," &c. Did you ever see it stated in Scripture that good things came out of his heart naturally? God has tried it in every way. It was lawless, broke law, killed His Son, resisted His Spirit.

W. I see what you mean by Scripture being the history of original sin; and in truth it is so. The dealings of God, in patient mercy, which we find there, in truth only brought this out, so that we might have a scriptural delineation, a history which proved that sin; which, after all, is the history, however far that sin may be developed in them, of our own hearts. For self-will, law-breaking, slighting Christ, resisting the appeals of God, was not confined to antediluvians or Jews.

H. No; it is the picture of my heart brought carefully out. The Scripture hath concluded all under sin, that all might come on the ground of pure mercy. And you will see that, developed only in promise in Adam's time, then by prophecy, in figures under the law (in spite of senseless rationalist judgment as to them), in accomplishment in Christ, in testimony to His glory by the Holy Ghost sent down from heaven, the putting of it away is the great doctrine of Scripture. "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin (not the sins, as often falsely cited) of the world." It is changing the whole principle on which the world, as such, stood, as we saw before. So, again: "But now once in the consummation of ages"—these times of testing responsible man from Adam to Christ—"He hath appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself." That is morally founded, as to the glory of God, on the death of Christ; and man after Him is introduced by resurrection into the new condition, beyond sin, consequent on that glorifying of God. At the same time there is the bearing of sins for the redeemed; but that is not our subject now.

W. I conceive you clearly now, and I think it brings the heart into a most healthy moral atmosphere, because it is not merely feeling safe, but one sees that God is glorified; that all—speaking reverentially—His moral nature is fully displayed, and glorified in that wonderful sacrifice. It gives a depth to Christ's sacrifice which mere salvation, precious as it is to us, could not do, though we come into it so. But I understand better: "Now is the Son of Man glorified, and God glorified in Him; and if God be glorified in Him, God shall also glorify Him in Himself, and shall straightway glorify Him." And note this wondrous word—it is "The Son of Man."

H. Most just. And hence, while, as you say, we must come in as sinners by the cross, or there is no truth in the inward parts, and sin is not judged in ourselves, without which there is no moral deliverance, and by which, if I may so speak, we morally side with God against ourselves as sinners, and against sin; yet, when we have entered in by this new and living way, it is not a standing without, in the hope that, by the blessed One's bearing our sins on the cross, we may be safe; but, that though that has, and where it has, been fully realized in us as the needed and only way (and it is morally necessary it should be), we have now passed within, by the new and living way, and contemplate the cross in peace, so to speak, from the Divine side, and see all the absolute beauty of it. And there is nothing like it—nothing in which God is thus morally glorified. "Therefore doth my Father love me, because I lay down my life that I might take it again." He does not even say, "for the sheep,"—it is the thing itself which is so excellent. And this makes me so often feel mere evangelical teaching so poor, even where true, as I thankfully say it is, as far as it goes. It leaves the Christian outside, hoping and thinking only of himself, instead of, on the deep conviction there is no good thing in himself at all, bringing him in by an accomplished work; and then looking that, as within, he should display the character suited to it.

W. But they dread Antinomianism.

H. They are right to dread every inconsistency, and to distrust themselves. But I suspect that the true secret of putting Christians under the law (which Christianity does not, and that these rationalists see, because their consciences are untroubled by it, clear enough) is, that, having nothing of the discipline of the primitive Church, they are obliged to modify the Gospel, and make the law a schoolmaster after Christ, to keep men in order. Then all fall naturally into it. Because man has the keeping of it; it flatters man. If he has a tender conscience, tortures him, as we often see; if not, he thinks of himself, takes for granted some failure is to be there, judges it perhaps pretty easy, will really sorrow over it, if the new nature be there; but, in any case, can think of himself, and that the heart likes. A man likes thinking badly of himself, ay, and saying so, better than not thinking of himself at all, and simply displaying Christ's gracious li. by thinking on Him only. We have to judge ourselves; but our right state is thinking of the Lord alone.

W. You are severe on men.

H. Is it not true? Is not having done with self the really difficult thing? Is it not the aim of Christianity, settling first, in a Divine way, the question of sin righteously with God by atonement? And is not power there to deliver from self or flesh, and give us the victory, though we may fail?

W. I do not deny it. But it is a humbling thought that we are such.

H. It is so. But it is better to know ourselves; and the largest supplies of grace, and Divine objects, are there to take us out of ourselves. In the Philippians we have the pattern of it in one of like passions with ourselves. There, in the picture of the Christian normal state, the flesh (save having no confidence in it) and sin are not mentioned. Yet the writer had a thorn in the flesh to keep it down. If we were perfectly humble, we should not need humbling. But we do, all of us, even Paul, as we see in this case. Christ, then, has been manifested to put away sin out of God's sight, out of man's heart, and out of the world. The great work which does it is accomplished, the results not all accomplished in power. He who has not judged original sin, has not that estimate of the new nature animated by the Spirit of God which is on God's side against sin. I judge the individual in no way. He may hate what he sees in himself of actual sin. I speak of abstract moral truth. He who does not see the principle, and nature, and guilt of sin, as it stands in man's self-will, has not the estimate which the knowledge of a holy nature in reconciliation to God gives. We have made a long excursion, but we will return to our Essay. But the subjects lay at the root of the matter.

W. Clearly they do. I was struck, as by a kind of providence, how, in this strange list of subjects in the Essay, these three great vital points which are at the root of the question—inspiration, the Holy Spirit, original sin—are dragged in. And it is of them we have been speaking, and Scripture is quite clear as to them.

H. We will continue, then, our inquiry into the principles of the Essay. I feel how tedious entering into these details is, but it is impossible to meet the system without doing so in a measure.

W. Do not fear to do so. It is better to meet it fully, because the difficulties are raised, and the doubt thrown on the whole truth and its sources by them, on the spirit in which we are to read Scripture, can only be met by taking up the details. One returns to simplicity by it, and the Word to its full and simple authority in the soul.

H. Well, we will proceed, then. It is the character of what follows, as in general of the Essay, to mingle a mass of conventional ideas and scriptural precepts or doctrines together, and, by proving the groundlessness of men's comments, to throw like doubt on scriptural statements; and hence the need of some detail. But there is a deadly principle running through all; making men's present habit of thinking the measure of the fitness of the Word of God; and thus gradually leading to the belief that it was the product of the age and country it was written in. True, it may be said, it is only its form and expression. But as we have biblical truth only in that expression, if I change it for what suits the West and the nineteenth century, I shall soon change it for what suits myself, who live there at that epoch, and we might as well not have it all. It is pretended to save it by great principles; for I cannot but think that the Word has power in Mr. Jowett's soul. Yet such is the result of his system. I call your attention with pleasure to such expressions as, "But, at any rate, they (the precepts of Christ) are not to be explained away; the standard of Christ is not to be lowered to ordinary Christian life, because ordinary Christian life cannot rise even in good men to the standard of Christ."

W. That is excellent, surely.

H. Undoubtedly. It is the same happy inconsistency with what I quoted before, which we have already noticed; and even here, in the same page, speaking of our Lord's remarks on the danger of riches, and recommendation to sell all, he says, "Precepts like these do not appeal to our own experience of life." "Religious sects or orders who have seized this aspect of Christianity have come to no good." And then it is all melted down in the following words, while lauding some rare stars, to a truth of feeling: "Let not the refinement of society make us forget that it is not the refined only who are received into the kingdom of God," &c. Now, I find Scripture owning the rich, as such, when the Gospel had spread: "Charge them that are rich in this world." But that does not weaken in the smallest degree the contrast between Lazarus and Dives, or the extreme danger to true heavenly mindedness of treasure in this world. At no time, as Peter says to Ananias, was it claimed from any one that they should give their goods to the Church, nor mentioned to them. It was the free power of the Holy Ghost working in love to others. There was no community of people or goods established at all, but a voluntary giving up of one's own where it could be made available; and most blessed it was, and, acting in the spirit of it, will be always blessed, though there be no Apostles at whose feet I may lay what I have to dispose of. Riches are as dangerous now as then, devotedness as acceptable now as then. There is in principle no great difference in these respects, though in forms of life there may be. All this, however, is a mere question of worldliness or its degrees. "The friendship of the world is enmity with God, and whosoever will be the friend of the world is the enemy of God." Mr. Jowett refers to "swear not at all." As this question comes often into public, I will just refer to this too. The same principle which hinders my swearing of myself, makes me take an oath, as it is called, before a magistrate. I bring in God lightly in one case; I own Him in the magistrate, as I am bound to do, in the other. The Lord and James speak only of voluntary oaths—what comes from self. Whatsoever is more than this cometh of evil, i. e., more than yea, yea, and nay, nay, in our conversation. So the Lord speaks of vows, i. e., voluntary swearing to the Lord. But in Lev. v. we find adjuring and a man bound to utter it, and, consequently, the Lord answers before the High Priest. The oath imposed by a magistrate is adjuring, and I judge a man to be wholly in fault who does not take the oath. He disowns God's authority in the magistrate. Other details I pass by, only remarking, that the instruction contained in the parable of the Good Samaritan is grace contrasted with law. In answer to the question, Who is my neighbour whom I am bound to love? we find love acting as a neighbour to need, and that is God's principle. But in all these cases, important no doubt in practice, we have more a pastor's or an expositor's work. But then Mr. Jowett, men's minds being thus thrown into uncertainty, suddenly plunges us into doubts on the fundamental truths of Christianity, such as the Divinity of Christ, justification by faith, the state of condemnation in which sinners are lying—the doubt being always applied to the truth. Now this seems to me somewhat disingenuous. He compares the Athanasian Creed, which he must be supposed to have signed and use, with the words, "Neither the Son", in Mark xiii. 32. He says we do not readily recall the verse when maintaining the Athanasian Creed. Now as to doctrine, what may seem strange, I like the Athanasian Creed the best of all, though it be far too scholastic in form. But I maintain no creed, but I do maintain the proper Divinity of the Lord Jesus. That He was in a personal relationship as Son to Father, every one who believes in His Divinity, unless a Sabellian, owns. But it is to me as clear as the sun at noonday, that Christ was the Jehovah of the Old Testament, who could say, Before me there was no God. I know not any. All the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Him, and dwells, of course, bodily. He was Immanuel: His name called Jesus (Jah, the Saviour), for He shall save His people from their sins. When Isaiah, in chap. vi., saw the thrice holy Jehovah of Hosts, he saw, says John, Christ's glory, and spake of Him. If the Son of Man was brought to the Ancient of days, the Ancient of days came (Dan. vii.). If the blessed and only potentate, King of king and Lord of lords, showed the appearing of Christ in Timothy, Christ when He appears is King of kings and Lord of lords. It is to me as evident as possible, historically, that the Arian doctrine came direct from Philo, at least from the Alexandrian school of philosophers, or Platonist Jews, who held that the supreme God could not be directly connected with the material creation; and spoke of the λογος, the Word, as between the Supreme God and the creation, begotten, perhaps, rather than made; yet, after all, existing as a creature by the will of the Creator, the Supreme God. Now, save the dear good old Irenæus, and a word or two from Polycarp and Ignatius, all the earlier Greek Fathers were of this school. Justin Martyr, a Platonist, taught this doctrine, so Clemens, so Origen. It was Platonism, not Scripture, and deeply infected the Church. These Fathers are no way to be trusted; they show it, and this spread west, too, in the existence of the words ενδιαθετος and προφορικος. All that is directly and verbally from the Philo school. I accept none of this. I find it met in face by John and Paul, carefully and fully met. I read, "In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God." Wherever my mind can go back to as a beginning as to time, there He was. And that there may be no plea of ενδιαθετος, that is His inherence as reason without being a person, he adds, "He was in the beginning with God;" always a distinct person. And lest any inferiority should be alleged, Paul tells us: "All the fulness was pleased to dwell in Him," for that is the true force of the passage. And so the fact is declared to have been: "For in Him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily." As a person, He emptied Himself, εκενωσε σεαυτον. He could not have done so save as God. A creature who leaves his first estate sins therein. The sovereign Lord can descend in grace. In Him it is love. Then, as in that position, He receives all. All the words He has are given to Him. He is, though unchangeable in nature as God, yet in His path a dependent man. He lives by every word that proceeds out of the mouth of God, is sealed by the Father, the glory He had before the world is now given Him of the Father. Now, in this state of obedient servant with a revelation which God gave to Him, the day and hour of His judicial action was not revealed.

“It is not for you,” He says to His disciples, “to know the times and the seasons which the Father has put in His own power.” And to this exactly Psalm cx. answers, as has been observed by another: “Sit on my right hand till I make thine enemies thy footstool.” When? Sit there in this place of Divine glory till—no more is said. Now, I do not pretend to explain—God forbid I should!—how this is. I see in Scripture the full (not θεωτης merely, but) θεωτης of Christ maintained by the truth, that none can know the Son but the Father; the Father we do. He is simply the adorable God. “No man knows the Son but the Father, and no man knows the Father but the Son, and he to whom the Son shall reveal Him.” The Son’s Divine nature seemed, so to speak, exposed to danger by His blessed humiliation—not so the Father. It is secured (I mean, of course, as to thought) by His being thereby absolutely unfathomable. Such I believe He is. I know He is the Son; I know He is a true proper man. I know He is: “I AM,” “the true God.” How to put this together I do not know, though I see and know they are together, am glad I do not as a creature. Did I know, I should have lost that Divine fulness which, if capable of being fathomed when in manhood, was not truly then Divine. God, through grace, I know; man, too, I know, in a certain sense; but God become a man is beyond all, even my spiritual thoughts. Be it so. It is infinite grace, and I can adore. I am sure for my soul’s blessing He is both; and the Son of the Father too—for the persons are as distinct as the nature is clear. Say to a Christian, the Son sent the Father, he would instinctively revolt at once. That the Father sent the Son, is the deepest joy of his soul. All heresies are met by Scripture, Sabellian, Arian, or others: but the Son is not known but of the Father. The Father He declares. I accept no creeds, but I do bow to the perfect Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ; the fulness of the θεωτητος is in Him. It is painful to see Mr. Jowett say not what he believes, but, in the midst of questions of practice, throw a doubt, and more than a doubt, on the Lord's divinity—hold his mind in a Pyrrhonic balance as to everything. Into the Calvinistic controversy it is hardly necessary to enter here. I believe Scripture precise, and should shock partizans, I suppose, on either side. I believe Christ died for all. I believe in an elect people. The XVIIth Article gives a very nice statement of the doctrine. It is equally painful, but common with this class, to see a lift given to Popery over the stile. I believe the Church is founded on the rock—the Rock Christ, as Augustine even says, and that the gates of hell will never prevail against it. I believe Peter had the keys, not of heaven, nor of the Church—men do not build with keys, there are no keys of the Church at all thought of in Scripture, but the keys of the kingdom. I believe Peter used them. It was a common expression for administrative power, and he had and exercised it, as we see in the Acts. I believe, moreover, according to Matt. xviii. 18, that what the Apostles bound on earth in the exercise of their ministry was sanctioned by Heaven; and, further, that what is told to the assembly, and in which the assembly so acts, will be sanctioned, and that wherever two or three are gathered in Christ's name Christ is; but what the Pope has to do with two or three gathered thus, I know not. This may suffice here. There is not a tittle of ground for the corruptest system that ever was on earth to stand upon. The word Church may deceive; but say first, Go yourself; then two or three; then tell it to the assembly (which is what is said), and all popish reasonings and rationalists' objections dissolve in air. This is not freedom from, but bondage to, conventional teaching in Mr. Jowett. I know not to what he refers in 1 Cor. iii. 15, unless it be purgatory, a notoriously modern doctrine. The early Fathers' doctrine of a middle state had nothing whatever to do with purgatory. Augustine vaguely hints at it; but his doctrine is as loose as can be. He speaks of the judgment-day being a purgatorial fire. Gregory the Great first pro- pounds it as possible for any very little sins. That is, it was invented some 600 years after Christ ; and the plainest historical proofs exist of its modern character. Tertullian is treated as unsound by Romanists themselves on it. But the doctrine of 1 Cor. iii. applies to labourers, not simply to Christians ; their work is tried and burnt. And, further, it is admitted by present writers among them, that this cannot be applied to purgatory (though they do so where men are ignorant), because here all are to go through it, and that is not their doctrine ; for the saints do not in their system. The prayers for the dead, on which dishonest Roman Catholics found their doctrine, included, in the earlier ages, even the Virgin Mary, as Epiphanius says, to distinguish all from Christ. But what is the result of all these doubts ? “ Nor is it, indeed, easy to say what is the meaning of proving a doctrine from Scripture.” It is easy enough. It is finding it there, learning it there, and showing where you have learned it. Those who have creeds, and dogmas, and articles to prove at all costs, are naturally embarrassed. They have to adapt Scripture to the formularies of men ; to what scholasticism, or partial knowledge, has laid down. But what I have really learned from Scripture I can, with God’s help, easily prove from it. And that is the secret of their embarrassment. They have not learnt their doctrine from Scripture, and they do not know how to prove anything by it. And then see where you are landed. “ Nay, more, it is a book written in the East, which is in some degree liable to be misunderstood ” (I read : “ Then opened He their understanding to understand the Scriptures”), “ because it speaks the language and has the feeling of Eastern lands. Nor can we readily determine, in speaking the words of our Lord or St. Paul, how much even of the passages just quoted is to be attributed to Oriental style.” I will just quote you another passage from Mr. Jowett’s commentaries, which will lead us somewhat further in this path, only to Africa instead of Asia. After speaking of the tendencies of the Jewish mind, he says, “ We cannot doubt that the entrance of Christianity into the world was not sudden or abrupt; that is an illusion which arises in the mind from our slender acquaintance with contemporary opinions. Better, and higher, and holier as it was, it was not absolutely distinct from the teaching of the doctors of the law, either in form or substance; it was not unconnected with, but gave life and truth to, the mystic fancies of Alexandrian philosophy. Even in the counsels of perfection of the sermon on the mount, there is probably nothing which might not be found, either in letter or spirit, in Philo or some other Jewish or Eastern writer. The peculiarity of the Gospel is, not that it teaches what is wholly new, but that it draws out of the treasure-house of the human heart things new and old, gathering together in one dispersed fragments of truth." I wish I could quote what follows, but it would lead me too far. Mr. Jowett turns round and says there remains what eludes criticism—processes of life, about which we know nothing; the figure which St. Paul applies to the resurrection of the body (except it die), "is true, also, of the renewal of the soul, especially in the first ages, of which we know so little, and in which the Gospel seems to have acted with far greater power than among ourselves."

W. How singular! Mr. Jowett puts me in mind of a person who, having lived blind and among blind people all his life, has just got his eyes open, and is telling us astonishing news—the first impressions he receives—as if never before discovered, yet reckons all distances wrong, and judges about all objects falsely; yet is no longer blind, but refers all things to his state of blindness, as he naturally must. It is so new that the poor man judges rightly of nothing. All is inconsistent, his head full of his old ideas mingled with new conceptions. Men are trees walking. What he would have known by touch, he does not yet by sight: as a dead orthodoxy may be truth, and is gone when the heart wants truth for itself.

it is a pity, in such a state, a man should set up to teach. Deeper wants in his own heart would have kept him from it. He would have wanted to have learned—I do not mean from man, but of Christ. He had the habit of teaching, I suppose. And then there is another thing, he got into the hands of others, inferior in this respect to himself—men still blind. He has got into this wretched system, where there is no truth, and the most offensive pretensions and copying from one another. And thus his Essay is a treatise of contradictions. I pursue his system only, for others are injured by it. For himself, I would hope the best. But see what his system comes to—his Eastern rhetoric. The revelation of God is composed of Alexandrian philosophy and the scattered fragments of truth in the human heart. All is doubt. What is rhetoric in it, what truth? What comes from Philo? How can the human heart, in which masses of error are mixed with scraps of truth, while the scraps of truth only make the error more powerful, judge of the elements of truth gathered up here? Can error judge of truth? All is confusion. Now, I admit that there were dregs of traditional truth worked up by Satan (who can use truth in man's mind, but not the truth as it is in God's) into idolatry, on the one hand, and philosophy on the other. I admit that the cravings of the human mind after God, and the knowledge of good and evil acquired at the fall, produced some apprehensions of partial truths. It was like the Achamoth of Sophia's cravings after Bythos, in the Valentinian system, which probably was an effort of 'Eastern lands' to describe these atoms of truth in the sea of confusion, and was most poetical,—a world formed of the sighs and tears, and I forget what else, of Achamoth, outside the Pleroma. In the Alexandrian system, as we have it in Philo, and perhaps the Book of Wisdom, much had been borrowed from Scripture, much from Plato, who, I cannot doubt, had got his notions from the Feroohers of Zoroaster, and which, except the Feroohers, is reproduced in Hegel and Schilling. Gentiles had traditions; Alexandrian philosophy had shreds of Judaism; but God was lost. Now God, who had compassion on man, took up every link where He could connect Himself in grace with man, while positively confirming His own revelation given in the Old Testament. He could take up the unknown God in Athens, the λογος in Alexandria, the Paraclete itself as a term. But what does He do? The unknown God is fully revealed with positive facts and Divine truth. The λογος was introduced by Platonic Jews in Alexandria, because God could have nothing to say to the mere creature; and the λογος might form others, but remained alone in His own nature. For John the λογος is God, who Himself becomes flesh. The cravings which philosophy had made a false system out of, not knowing God, are met (not a system made out of them) by the revelation of God Himself, the truth of all they sought, and the perfect grace they needed. It put down the philosophy, while it met all the seekings of man in it. It took up the old thoughts thus far; but to say it did not so much bring in what was new, is utterly false. All it brought in was new (save as the Old Testament revelation had spoken of it). But it did meet the hungerings of the human soul, which philosophy was wasting by ideas, and told the truth about the traditions which had been perverted into monstrous, idolatrous, and absurd legends. It is impossible to go through the discussion of some childish and some useful, though perhaps imaginative, adaptations of Scripture. But some points claim our attention. "It is admitted Scripture has only one meaning." We have partly spoken of this; but there are new points connected with it here. We are not now to decide whether Scripture is wise in having one or more, but whether it has. Now, in the use made of it here, the proposition, that it has only one meaning, is wholly false. Mystical and allegorical interpretations of the Fathers, I throw overboard at once. Scripture is not answerable for them; but our friend Philo and the Alexandrians mainly. But prophecy and symbolism of the Gospel in the law are referred to. Prophecy we have spoken of; but symbolism means types of the Old Testament applicable to things in the New. Now, I affirm that Old and New Testament concur in stating this to be so. Moses was commanded to make the tabernacle according to the pattern he had seen in the mount; nay, if God made such a system, we ought to expect some meaning in it more than gowns, and dresses, and curtains. When I read through the Scripture, I find the whole form of language framed on such a symbolical use, and the great facts of the New the plain counterpart to the symbols of the Old. You must crush the whole structure of Scripture in its most vital essences, tear the warp out of it so that it ceases to be a texture, before you undo this. Altars, tabernacles, the dwelling-place of God, sacrifices, priesthood, the rock, the water, the anointing, the holy place, the mercy-seat, the bloodshedding; I should go through every element of what constitutes its whole texture of thought, before I had closed the list of symbolical facts and objects presented in the Old Testament and taken up in the New, and which have entered, and that according to Scripture, into the whole conception and framework of our religious thought. It is not a way of interpreting Scripture, it is Scripture itself. Christ is the Lamb of God. He is a great High Priest entered into the holiest. And Paul goes further; he tells us as to the history itself: "All these things happened unto them for types, and they are written for our admonition, on whom the ends of the world are come." One, and only one, true meaning, therefore, is not the fact in this case. Say Moses was foolish, and Paul foolish; but if you so interpret Scripture, you interpret it contrary to its nature and positive directions. That is, you do not interpret it, you correct it. I have the facts—important, very important, in the history of the people—important as a history of God's dealings with the people; and I get them avowedly pattern facts. Keep the imagination in check—all quite right. Look for doctrines in doctrinal passages, and here for details and illustrations—all right. But do not pretend you are teaching us to interpret Scripture rightly when you are directly contradicting it, and saying to it, You are wrong. It is not the Fathers who have said that Sarah and Hagar were an allegory. We do not follow them in such a point, as saying, Does God take care for oxen?

W. On this point I do not think you need go further. If I use Scripture at all, and on the weightiest subjects, Mr. Jowett's principle becomes impossible. It breaks down, as you say, the whole structure of Scripture itself. And I see that he does not merely check the indulgence of imagination in it, which is quite right, but rejects the idea of more or less. He declares, that "in whatever degree it is practised, it is equally incapable of being reduced to any rule." I do not know whether he rejects the Epistle to the Hebrews, but evidently that book is gone wholly if his principle be true, and countless passages throughout the whole New Testament.

H. Temporal and spiritual Israel, as commonly used, I give him freely up. It is a mere abuse of words. I say, as commonly used; because in the common adaptation of prophecies, prophecies explicitly referring to Israel are applied to the Church, where the subject-matter and principles are completely opposed. Ordained forms, and facts of history, may have a symbolical application, but moral addresses refer to the objects and moral state of those addressed, and do not give us objects to interpret, but persons addressed. Zion means Zion when she is prophesied about. The prophecy concerns her because it speaks to her on the moral ground she is on, and the arbitrary application to the Church is entirely false, because the principle of relationship with God is different. A general principle, as that God is faithful or good, may be, of course, applied, with just care to see how it is used; but the people addressed are not symbolical objects, but moral persons, and the facts to happen real. If we are to speak of the Lord's prophecy as to Jerusalem, I apply the same principle; but I deny wholly that in Matthew, Titus, &c., is spoken of at all. There may have been something analogous; but its only direct application is to dealings yet to come, immediately after which the Lord will appear. I believe this because it says so. In Luke I have the siege of Jerusalem, and the language is carefully altered. I believe what is said in both passages. In Luke, whose Gospel always looks out to Gentiles, the times of the Gentiles after the siege are distinctly spoken of, before the signs that are to come. Remark here how doubt is thrown on all. It is asked: Is the application of types "to be regarded as the meaning of the original text, or an accommodation of it to the thoughts of later times?" Now, note that the Lord instituted the Last Supper as taking the place of the Passover. The Apostles apply in every passage these figures, so that the question is not if we are interpreting right; it extends to this, if the Lord and the Apostles are merely accommodating these figures or not? What does Mr. Jowett think? He says: "Our object is not to attempt here the determination of these questions, but to point out that they must be determined before any real progress can be made." The answer is, for every Christian the matter is determined. They believe in the Lord's and the Apostles' use of them—man's now they judge by Scripture to see if they are just.

W. I see no difficulty in the question. The use of any given type now is, of course, to be judged of when it is used. I find them most instructive, and, fitting in with positive doctrines which warrant what is drawn from them, they become living pictures and illustrations of what otherwise would escape you. They may not, in our hands, serve to found a doctrine as a first revelation of it, but as a vivid illustration and suggestion of truth they are invaluable.

H. Mr. Jowett insists on this because "The Old Testament will receive a different meaning accordingly as it is explained from itself or from the New. In the first case, a careful and conscientious study of each one for itself is all that is required; in the second case, the types and ceremonies of the law, perhaps the very facts and persons of the history, will be assumed to be predestined or made after a pattern corresponding to the things that were to be in the latter days." Now, all this is confusion from beginning to end. It ignores the positive statements of the volume pretended to be interpreted. And further, if the book be inspired, one Mind has formed it from beginning to end, and we must look for a co-ordinated system. If it be not, we find there is an end of predestinating facts or even statements. But we have seen that, if it is a true history, the whole system of the tabernacle was made after a pattern, which the Epistle to the Hebrews largely and specifically declares to be a heavenly one, and the tabernacle a pattern of things in the heavens. But we have this even more specifically defined. The law was a shadow of good things to come, and not the very image. There were sacrifices: so Jesus was a sacrifice. But the Jewish were repeated, proving that sin was not for ever put away for him who came by them; Jesus' was not repeated, because it was. There were many priests, because they died; for us but one, because He ever lives. There was a veil, and no one could go into the Holiest: now the veil is rent, and we have boldness to enter. The high priest stood, because his work was never finished. Jesus is set down at the right hand of God, because His work is finished for ever: and so on. These were the outlines of this vast exhibition of God's ways, to be a key, so to speak, near the eye. But neither Testament is simply to be explained by the other. In some points there is contrast, as law and Gospel, in other analogies, in other common principles, in other prophetic announcements. The only point we learn to have been hidden was the Church. That could not be revealed because it was based on the casting down of the middle wall of partition, and the Jewish system on its being strictly kept up. But if God be the Author of the sacred volume, it is monstrous to suppose there was not a preparatory leading on to the full revelation of God Himself, or that He revealed something which was wholly unconnected with and no way introductory to what followed. It was necessary to make distinct the difference between man's standing on the ground of his own responsibility, and grace; between requiring, however justly, and giving. And this, though prophets point to the giving, there is. But promises came before law; and even under law, a ministration of condemnation and death, there were ordinances which prefigured the way of grace, while the exacting of righteousness, which man had not, led him to the sense of the need which grace met. The understanding of all this rests on this: "They shall be all taught of God." Each part, as to its statements, is to be understood in itself; but, when simply understood, the correspondences and differences will appear, and rich instruction for man's soul be acquired out of them. All this division of Mr. Jowett's, and its consequences, is in the air, and written without any kind of reference to the facts of the case. We do not assume anything about it. We take what is said in the book itself about itself, and find it verified in the richest and most instructive manner. One would think Mr. Jowett had never read St. Paul's Epistles, or the Hebrews, or, indeed, any part of the New Testament; for, as I said, he does not reason on its interpretation here, but against its contents. And man's fancies, and Scriptural, that is, Divine expositions, are thrown together as of equal weight.

There is another interesting question which he touches on—the origin of the three first Gospels; but his conclusions—for he is one of the most illogical persons I ever met with—are in no way the consequence of his premises. He is constantly making a false division, and the true conclusion is outside all he says. There is a difficulty as to the forms of recital of the three first or synoptical Gospels. Marsh, who was educated in Germany, introduced into this country a modification of Eichorn's German theories. Eichorn changed his somewhat in consequence, afterwards, if I remember right. The singular fact is, that tantamount statements are found in these Gospels, often verbally the same, and yet sometimes different, and the facts placed in different connection. The only difficulty, and that which all are really entirely ignorant of, is, how to account for it. It affords no difficulty in reading, but great help. The difficulty is, for critics, simply how it should have happened. Mr. Jowett supposes the main facts were preserved orally. Now, till the Gospels were written, that seems to me a matter of fact, not "a probable solution," whatever use we may make of the fact. Only we have to remember that Christ told the Apostles they should be witnesses, because they had been with Him from the beginning. That they were kept, according to the promise, to bring all things to their remembrance, as Jesus had said, I believe; and that they were graciously secured in their memory and use of facts; still they spoke of what they had seen. But this, while very simple, does not at all account for the phenomena, because one Evangelist, even an Apostle, recounts facts where he was not present, and another who was present does not recount them—as Matthew and John, as to what passed in the garden of Gethsemane. The motive of the histories, and they had motives, are not in the casualty of memory, nor in the documents possessed. The theory is, they had the same tradition to use. Now, if they had had no governing motive, they would have put the facts together according to the document men have imagined, or the current tradition. But they do not. The order is distinct. The allegation that they are not distinct witnesses, is unfounded. They may, in particular parts, have used what all knew; but they are wholly in their accounts independent of one another. But I attach no kind of importance to independent witnesses, because I believe all was inspired. But I find clear proof of distinct objects in the Gospels, objects pursued in each, from one end to the other;

which rationalists, who always rest on the surface, have never found a trace of, and which gives the clearest proof of the absurdity of their theories of the structure of the Gospels. But as to the question raised, the facts of the case prove the contrary to what is pretended. If all used a common tradition, how comes it that the connection, order, and development of facts is so different, if there was not in each (as inspired, I believe) independent design? Men have a common tradition (it is only true of a part), and yet produce very different books. They are not memoranda thrown together unconnected, but a set of facts used in a definite, but diverse connection, so as to produce a different picture altogether of the Saviour's life, and large portions wholly omitted, and large portions introduced, all in connection with this design. Yet, all together, they make up the full character of the Saviour seen on earth. It is declared, moreover, that there were a mass of other facts which they do not record, because these suit the purpose. Again, whole scenes of labour and miracles are told in a few verses, where it met the point sought for; large details are given of single ones, when it revealed some trait of Christ's life or principle of God's dealings. Let me, before I enter on this, a little notice Mr. Jowett's conclusions from the statement I have quoted above. (1.) There is no necessity to reconcile inconsistent narratives—the harmony of the Gospels only means the parallelism of words. Now, I object totally to all harmonies, as such; but the remark is unfounded. A certain number of passages are parallel in words; but, as to a vast quantity of the materials, it is not the case. A harmony is merely an attempt at chronological order.

W. But why do you object to harmonies?

H. Because they are the confusion of accounts which are each written with a distinct Divine object. The facts are put together by the Holy Ghost, for I may speak as a believer with you, with an evident purpose, each Gospel presenting both Christ and the ways of God in a different light. To throw them all together is to destroy this purpose, and obscure the intelligence of the Gospels.

W. I understand. If there be such purpose in each, it must, of course, do so. Proceed.

H. The second conclusion of Mr. Jowett is: "There is no necessity to enforce anywhere the connection of successive verses, for the same words will be found in different connections in different Gospels." Now, the true conclusion is exactly the contrary. The Evangelists had some leading facts in common, containing, for they do so, important principles, and many other facts each to himself. They do not combine them alike, but form a picture different one from another, though combining into a whole; for no one who has examined the Gospels carefully can deny this. Now, the difference of connection is one great mark of this design. And the different connections in which the statements occur are one great clue to the design, though by no means its only evidence. Supposing I had this phrase: The Jews crucified the Son of God, the Lord of glory, at Jerusalem. And one writer went on: "Think of the wickedness of this people; this was their crowning sin. There, in the beloved city, whose children He would so often have gathered under His wings, these very children put their Messiah and Lord to death." As far as this goes, I should conclude this writer is bringing out the guilt of this people in Christ's death. And if I saw him going on, afterwards, to relate discoveries as to something else coming in, instead of Israel—as the Church or kingdom—the bearing of his narrative would gradually clearly open to me. Supposing another gave the same words, and said: "See the Son of God Himself crucified; how deep is His love, how sad the guilt of man! and those, too, who were nearest to Him, who had the best opportunity of seeing that He was indeed the Lord of glory, whom none of the princes of this world have known." I should gather, this writer is bringing out man's guilt.

general, and that no evidence will correct the evil of the heart. If I found afterwards the most touching doctrinal and parabolic illustration of man's evil and God's love, and not the Church or the kingdom, but heaven and another world, I should get hold, of course by study and Divine help, and gradually, of the bearing and design of this writing also. Patient investigation and waiting on Divine help, of course, are called for; but the difference of the connection in which the same words are found, is so far a special guiding trace to the discovery of the spirit and aim of the particular Gospel.

H. And what shall we say to Mr. Jowett's conclusion, that there is no need to notice the connections because they are different?

W. We had better leave it.

H. Be it so. But you cannot be surprised if rationalists' reasonings have no great weight with me. He adds: (3.) "Nor can the designs attributed to their authors be regarded as the free handling of the same subject on different plans; the difference consisting chiefly in the occurrence or absence of local or verbal explanations, or the addition or omission of certain passages." After what we have already seen we cannot be surprised at this remark. I have only added just now to my example certain passages. But what can possibly be more absurd than this? It depends wholly on what is added or omitted, or what the local explanation is. I do not see how an explanation in this case could be anything but local—for we are talking of connection of passages—or than verbal—for we are talking of words, and additions or omissions complete the list; so it is only saying no connection can explain the design, which is simply absurd; for the addition or verbal explanation might be even a statement of the design, so that the conclusion is utterly foolish. But it is not the fact. The order of the facts is constantly different, so as to give a totally different colour to them.

Save in a brief early part, when this is the main point, the choice of facts is totally distinct, though you see the same scenes. And then the different order and the whole structure of each Gospel, mark clearly its object. The parables afford the strongest proof of the design of the Gospel, and vary largely and abundantly; and in the last solemn scenes, while certain facts must be the same, the special adaptation to the character and design of the Gospel is as evident as possible. But I go further. Certain leading facts are common to all, at least to the three; but even these prove design, not a tradition gathered up, as it might be, from memory. They are significant facts, characteristic facts, connected with the immense change that was taking place by the rejection of Christ, and leading to this change. We are assured that they had an immense mass of other facts; yet he who had them does not recount them, but declares what his design is in what he does recount. But the facts were there, remembered, but not recounted; and those that are characteristic and common to all, differently connected with one another. I see, then, evidently design, I have no doubt Divine design, but certainly design. A selection of facts for all. By whom? Yet (and here we see independency) these facts so differently used, and in such different connections, that they could not have joined in arranging them, nor could there have been collusion. They would have avoided the differences reproached to them. We have a vast number of facts known, not used—a choice of facts, to a certain degree common to all, hence brought together by some one; but not by the writers together, for they use them all differently, and to different purposes, though all to present the Lord to us. And they have, besides, such a large number of other facts and discourses, which they introduce in the midst of the former, or all together—for both are true—completing evidently the specific design of each. Now, I get here distinct instruments, distinct objects, each instrument following his own, but, at the same time, a common Mind which has guided and overruled it all. As to the traditions of the Fathers, as to Mark and Luke, they may be true; between Luke and Paul there is certainly spiritual and historical connection; but they are of no sort of consequence. As they stand they are vague and contradictory, and founded on an utterly false principle, namely, to trace each Gospel to an Apostle. At the very best they are curiosities of history, which, if a person believes the book Divine, are of an entirely secondary interest.

H. It is a long task, but, to my mind at least, full of interest,—an inlet into the mind and grace of our God, and not merely dry antagonism with rationalism.

W. Quite so. I desire it the rather for that reason; for though we may be called upon to occupy ourselves with these Essays, still, by going effectually into Scripture, we get, with the arguments against them, by the positive proof of what is good, food, Divine food, for our own souls, which brings a conviction of a higher order.

H. Well, I will run through, then, as most strongly characteristic, the Gospels of John and Matthew, so as to mark their character; just referring to Luke, and Mark, too, which, as you know, is a shorter one, and rapid in its course as to facts, to confirm the general principle. I will begin with John, because it is perhaps the most easy to seize. John's great doctrine is the Son of God on earth, and eternal life in Him, and the revelation of God in and by Him. In his Epistle he goes on to the manifestation of this same life in the disciple. He is the eternal life which was with the Father, and has been manifested unto us. Then, "he that hath the Son hath life," and so, "which thing is true in Him and in you." The details are the traits of this life, the knowledge of the love of God in it through the Spirit, and fellowship with the Father and the Son. In the Gospel to which I will now confine myself, it is His person and the gift of the Comforter when He is gone. I will run through the chapters of this Gospel, to see if there be not a leading idea running all through, to which the peculiar facts recorded are subservient. That idea is the Son of God outside of, and above all dispensational dealings, in the blessedness of His own person, though, as a man, and taking fully a man's place. But it is, as I think I have remarked, not man taken up to heaven, but a Divine person come down to earth. In the first chapter there are three parts, 1—18, 19—34, and thence to the end; but this continued chap. ii. 1—22. The first is the abstract glory of His nature. He is God, but a distinct person, with God, and that in eternity, life, light: John was His witness. There was this singular phenomenon, light shining in darkness, and the darkness remaining what it was; and then the Word made flesh and dwelling among us,—the only begotten Son in the bosom of the Father, who makes God known. Next we have what Christ does, His work, the Lamb of God who takes away the sin of the world, and the baptism with the Holy Ghost. We then find Christ the centre and gatherer of the remnant of Israel. In the first of the two days, John the Baptist's work to this end is spoken of; in the second, Christ's. This last, I doubt not, like Matt. x., goes down, in principle, to His return. I would note, in passing, that we have here Christ as a Divine centre, for none can be such truly but God; next the one only path through a world in which there is none for man, for there can be none for children who have wilfully abandoned their Father's house till they turn back to it; and then the heaven open, and man (in Christ) the object of Divine favour, and the mighty ones, the most exalted of creatures, his servants. Nathanael owned Him, according to the second Psalm. He takes his place, according to the eighth. Here note, that the Jews and world, as such, are wholly outside, 10, 11; (the Jews are always treated as reprobates in this Gospel), and those born of God alone owned, 12, 13. In a word, we have not dispensational dealings, but the deep realities of the Divine nature in relationship to men and the world, though it is fully owned that the Jews were God's people. The second chapter, called the third day, I have no doubt intimates the double aspect of Christ's reunion with His earthly people—the marriage and the judgment. I can quite accept that such a figure, though to me, from the connection, undoubted, may not be admitted. I do not complain of this, but, as I am saying what I think, I would not omit it. In ii. 23, iii. 21, we have the great foundations of the new state of things—born of God, and the cross; the latter, in the double aspect of the Son of man must be lifted up; the love of God has given His Son. The condemnation is, the coming in of light. 22—36 In the full aspect of the new state of things, and the absolutely heavenly character of the witness, are gone into. iv. After this introduction—for such it is—(John was not yet cast into prison, and Christ had not yet presented Himself), He leaves Judæa, practically driven out by the Jews, and in Samaria, where no promise was (salvation, He declares in the chapter, was of the Jews), unfolds the living power of the Holy Ghost, which He could give as God—for God was giving, not requiring—and which He was humbled, so as to be the weary One craving a drink of water, that man might have; and then finds the way to man's unintelligent heart, as it ever must be, by the conscience. Nothing more lovely than this whole picture—the rejected and weary One finding His meat in showing grace to this wearied but guilty heart; but I must not dwell on it here. It opened to His view the fields white for harvest at the moment He was cast out. In v. we have the Son of God giving life to whom He will. The general picture is man's incompetency to get healed by strength in himself, and Christ, in contrast, bringing life, and that eternal life, so as to escape judgment. The end of the chapter shows life in Him, with every evidence, and man would not come to have it. This is man's responsibility as to Christ. In chap. v., He is the life-giving

Son of God. Chapter vi., He is the Son of man, the object of faith come into the world, and dying, so that faith feeds on Him. . The general picture is Christ satisfying the poor with bread, according to Ps. cxxxii. ; owned Prophet, refusing then to be King, going up on high alone, while His disciples were tossed and toiling in His absence ; He rejoins them, and they are at land ; a Christ, the true manna (2—9), incarnate, and dying (understood in spirit), their true food. vii., He cannot show Himself at the feast of Tabernacles. The feast of Passover is fulfilled in Him. The Pentecost on the day so called. But the Tabernacles, where Israel celebrated their rest after the harvest and vintage (known figures of judgment), are not even yet. He promises the Spirit meanwhile, as Israel had the water out of the rock in the desert ; only now it should be in him who came to Him to drink, and flow forth as rivers in this desert world. Thus we have the triple fruition of the Holy Ghost giving life as born of Him, the Spiritual power of life in us rising up to its full blessing as eternal life, and 'flowing forth in blessing from us as a river. This closed the direct communication of Christ as to His position on earth. In viii. His word is rejected ; there He is light. In ix. His works ; here He gives eyes to see. He gives eyes to a poor sheep cast out, who having owned Him as a prophet, finds He is the Son of God. Then comes all He is for His sheep, from His entering in Himself by the door as a subject man, then laying down His life for them, of infinite value in itself also, to His being one with the Father. In xi. and xii., being thus rejected, He receives just testimony, in spite of men, to His being Son of God (resurrection and life), in Lazarus' resurrection ; to his being Son of David, in riding in on the ass ; to His being Son of man, by the Greeks coming up. But He declares that, to take this place, He must die or abide alone. He must be lifted up to draw (not Israel as a living Messiah) but all men. The Evangelist then unfolds how it stood with Israel, and Christ how it stood with the world at large in respect of Himself. He is now owned, so to speak, as crucified, i. e., His teaching takes up what is beyond it. He was come from God and went to God. The Father had delivered all into His hand. And now if He could not abide with His disciples as a companion upon earth, He would make them fit to be with Him in heaven, have a part with Him. They were washed, as completely regenerated by the Word; but, as priests connected with the sanctuary and holy service, must have their feet washed as to daily conversation. That, He was their servant still to do. He then refers to His betrayal and Peter's denial of Him, the perfect wickedness of flesh and its weakness; declares the value Godward of the death of the Son of man and its fruit in His then entering into Divine glory, and being no more (bodily) for any in the world. xiv., He unfolds His disciples' position in consequence. He was not going to be alone on high, He was going to prepare a place for them; but having revealed the Father in Himself, they knew where He was going, for He was going to the Father, and they had seen Him in Him; and they knew the way, for they had come to the Father in coming to Him. That was as already there; but on going away He would obtain another Comforter for them. In Spirit He would come to them, manifest Himself to them, and the Father and Himself make their abode with them. The path of obedience and responsibility on Christian, not on Adam ground, is in this and the following chapter fully set out. He left what He could only give in leaving, for He made it by the cross, peace; gave them His own peace; but He was truly a man, cared for their love; if they loved Him they would be glad He was going to His Father, to rest and glory. But there was a difficulty. What about the vine that God brought out of Egypt and planted? This He meets in the following chapter. Israel was not the vine, though as a people it were so. He Himself was the true Vine, they were the branches. He was not, as they thought of Messiah, the best branch of the old vine; He was the vine, and they the branches. He then enlarges upon the way of bearing due fruit, dependence and obedience, and, if His words abode in them, asking what they would: most important instructions, which I regret passing over so rapidly, only that I must confine myself to my present object—the general idea. As He has returned to this rejection of the old provisional vine, so to speak, He shows that to be without excuse, and as really having seen and hated (not Messiah, though He was such), but Him and His Father. It is laid on its intrinsic moral grounds. Hence, when the Comforter was come—before He had spoken of the Father's sending Him, now of His sending Him from the Father to testify of Him glorified (as before, to bring to remembrance what He had said upon earth), they also having to bear testimony as with Him from the beginning—in the xvi. chapter, when the Comforter was come, He would bear witness in the world, of sin, righteousness, and judgment, in connection with His rejection, and going away to His Father; and guide the disciples into all truth, show them things to come, and glorify Christ (all that the Father had being His); and then places them in immediate confident relationship with the Father. For the moment they were to be in sorrow, and scattered. In xvii., addressing His Father—wonderful thought that we should be admitted to hear!—He looks to taking His own place, as Son on high, to glorify Him, in virtue of His work which He had finished; the one our place, the other our title to it. He puts them in it, having manifested His Father's name to them, and gives to them all the communications made to Him in it on earth, and prays for them, on the ground of their being the Father's, and on the ground of His being glorified in them. He prays they may be kept in the name of the Holy Father, and Divine names are the power of the thing named. Holiness, His holiness, and children; these are our place. This, that Christ's own joy might be fulfilled in them. Then

He gives, not the words, but the Word, the testimony, and the world hates them. They are completely put in Christ's place on earth in every respect, sanctified by the truth, and He Himself set apart, away from men, on high, to be the source of this their setting apart, by the revelation of what He was to their hearts. Next, He gives them the glory the Father had given Him, but, beyond all, will have them with Himself where He is. And, as partaking of His glory hereafter, will prove to the world they were loved as He was; so that He manifests the Father's name now, that the Father's love to Him may be in them on earth, and He in them. Having thus completed His disciples' place in His absence, and even to their heavenly rest—of which John speaks little, barely in the beginning of xiv. and at the end of xvii., and this only in the full result—in the xviii. he enters on the final history of the Lord's days on earth. But this, even more than any other part, shows the Divine person who is above all circumstances. John was one of the three present, as near as any could be, in the agony in Gethsemane. He gives not a word of it; while Matthew, who was present at what John recounts, tells nothing of that, but does of the agony. Now, if these contrasted circumstances were not characteristic they might not prove much, but they are most strikingly characteristic. I will briefly recall to you those mentioned by St. John. All point out the Son of God, wholly above circumstances; the free offering up of Himself. Judas comes; the Lord advances and names Himself. They all go backward and fall to the ground. Had He sought escape He had only to go away, but He asks again, and then says, "If ye seek me, let these go their way:" the blessed sign, as the Apostle witnesses, how He stood in the gap, and, however poor and weak, the disciples escaped untouched. With this love we have perfect love to His Father, and perfect obedience. "The cup which my Father has given me, shall I not drink it?"—and no more. The miracle of healing, even, is not noticed by John, though he can give the servant's name. So all His answers to the chief priest are in the calm superiority of one above all that surrounded Him, while the full guilt and madness of the Jews is fully brought out, as they are seen in all the Gospel; and in rejecting Him they deny their own place, "We have no king but Cæsar." Christ's answers before Pilate bear the same stamp, as one above all. As we had no agony in the garden, so no "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" on the cross. Finally, Jesus knowing now all was finished, a single passage remaining to be fulfilled, says, "I thirst," and, having drank the vinegar, says, "It is finished." He then bows His head, and gives up His own spirit. Meanwhile, in perfect calmness, He committed His mother to John, and charged John with the care of her. No bone is broken, but Joseph and Nicodemus make Him to be with the rich in His death. Now, in all this—and John, mark, was with Him, as near as any could be in His agony, and standing by at the cross—all that marked the anguished man is omitted, and all that presents the Son of God is introduced. I find design, that is; a blessed and beautiful appearing, as a true, lowly, and obedient man, no doubt, but — an appearing of the Son of God, as such, for faith on earth; revealing His Father all His life, and even in the circumstances of His death, Son of God still.

W. Though the whole synoptical analysis of the Gospel is important to our purpose, yet the character of the last facts referred to, in connection with the blessed Lord's death, is to me even more striking still. I do not see how it is possible to avoid seeing a Divine design in connection with the purpose of the whole Gospel, and the aspect in which the Lord is viewed throughout it;—His person, as the new foundation of all when He had been offered up in sacrifice, the Jews being wholly rejected. It is striking, too, that he does not mention what he alone of the Evangelists might have been, in some measure, an eye-witness of.

H. Two chapters remain to consider, relating His history after the resurrection. They are throughout, I do not doubt, significative as to the dispensational dealings consequent on the truths already brought out. Such applications are not like doctrines, we must leave them to the judgments of others. But I will state them to you. Their orderly completeness, I have no doubt, proves the truth of the view I suggest. The fact of Christ's resurrection known only by sight, without the testimony of God in the word that He must rise, produces no effect. They go home. But Mary, out of whom seven devils had been cast, wants Jesus Himself—in ignorance, no doubt, but in true affection. When this had been fully and most beautifully brought out—the world had nothing for her but Him—Jesus reveals Himself to her, and makes her the messenger of the witness of the believers' position. He was not come back to be corporally present for the kingdom, and reign over Israel. He could, through redemption, call His disciples brethren, and they were in the same relationship to His God and Father as He was. This gathers them, and He is in their midst, and pronounces peace—for He had now made it: then sends them forth, breathing into them the living power of the Holy Ghost. Afterwards Thomas believes on seeing, but full blessing arose from believing now without seeing. Now, I have no doubt, while this put the disciples, historically, in their true place and relationship to God; yet we have a picture of the whole period from Christ's resurrection to the time of His return; first, the remnant who had known Him before; then the Church formed without seeing Him, and in possession of peace with God, and His presence, as assembled; then sent forth in the power of the Holy Ghost, with remission of sins, for others; then the remnant of Israel, in the latter days, who will believe by seeing. This introduces the Millennium. The last chapter has avowedly in it that which is mysterious, and evidently intentionally so. I have no doubt myself that it follows on consecutively after the Lord's return. Seen on earth, seen in resurrection, seen now the third time, i. e., when He returns. He puts Himself on the original ground of His associations with Israel only in power. The nets do not break, the ships do not sink. He has already gathered fish, but the great haul is then taken, and without the ensuing failure as it was in previous service. Remark, too, we are in Galilee, and there is no ascension. This suits John; it is Divine manifestation on earth, not man's going to heaven; hence, it links on to the future display of power, not to Christ's coming to receive the Church which is united to Him while in heaven. Peter follows Christ, and is to be cut off, and, I believe, the whole Jewish church system with him. John is left in testimony to connect it with that which is to come, so that the disciples thought he was not to die, but this was not said. Now these last points I leave to the Christian perception of every one who examines the Gospel with care; but the facts prove the co-ordinated character of the history, from one end of the Gospel to the other, completing one distinct and clear exhibition of Christ outside legal Judaism, in every chapter up to His taking His sheep, which closed all recognition of the fold, being Christ in contrast with that Judaism, and presenting the setting up of a new thing in Him. Peter's ministry, who served in the circumcision, like Jesus, would end like His. But John's, who represented ministry outside it, but not heavenly, though leading individuals there, would go on till Christ came.

W. All this requires study to verify the consistency of details, and the general character you give to it, where it is mysterious, which it evidently purposely is; but the fact of a definite character and design in the Gospel is evident.

H. There is another point I would note here on occasion of the xv. chapter. The notion of the application of the words in Hosea, "I have called my Son out of Egypt" to Christ, is ridiculed by rationalists. Now, I affirm distinctly that it is according to the tenor of Scripture testimony and perfectly rightly applied. It is a great leading truth. If you look at Isaiah xlix., you will see Messiah distinctly presented as taking the place of Israel. I think we have spoken, when on the pseudo-Isaiah of infidels, of the elect servant of Israel, Christ the elect servant, and the remnant the elect servant of the last days. But this xlixth chapter is more definite. Israel is first presented as Jehovah's witness in the earth, as the polished shaft in His quiver. "Thou art my servant, O Israel, in whom I will be glorified. Then I said," says Messiah, "I have laboured in vain, and spent my strength for nought and in vain." And so it was with Christ on earth. "But now, saith Jehovah, who formed me from the womb to be His servant, to bring Jacob again to Him, though Israel be not gathered, yet shall I be glorious in the eyes of Jehovah, and my God shall be my strength. And He said, It is a light thing that thou shouldst be my servant to raise up the tribes of Jacob, and to restore the preserved of Israel, I will also give thee for a light to the Gentiles, and to be my salvation to the end of the earth." That is, Israel is presented as the servant of the Lord; but when Christ comes, if it were so, His labour was in vain, and then Christ, though to restore the remnant in due time, is Himself God's servant, and light goes forth to the Gentiles. This is the passage Paul so strikingly quotes as justifying his turning from the Jews to the Gentiles, when the former rejected his message. Christ takes the place of Israel under the law, Israel after the flesh. This He does all through John, though in a higher way, as revealed Son of God. Hence, in xv., He proclaims Himself as the true vine; Israel was the well-known vine, and, as remarked before, Messiah was to be the best branch, the topmost bough. But Israel is set aside. The true vine, as the true servant, is Christ. Israel was Jehovah's son, His first born; but Christ was the son, the true first born of every creature. Hence, as rejected by Israel, He begins Israel's whole history afresh, and, as not deriving His position from the people, He is called out of Egypt, to begin their history according to God. Now, remark here, dear W., I am not saying whether Scripture be wise or foolish, I believe it divinely wise; but that is not my question now. What I say is, it is the system of Scripture to substitute Christ for Israel, the second Adam for the first, and, that what wholly failed as founded on the responsibility of man was taken up afresh in the perfect and unfailing Son of God. Indeed, this is true, as we have seen, as to every principle of God's dealings with men, but I now speak only of Israel. And hence, Matthew and the New Testament using the Old Testament Scripture, use it rightly according to the intended use of Scripture. People may quarrel with Scripture, but they cannot say that Matthew quotes, "Out of Egypt have I called my son," in a way not according to the intention of Scripture. It is the system and plan of Scripture, of the Old Testament itself, to transfer passages from Israel the provisional son to Christ the true Son thus.

H. I believe it to be the simple matter of fact. I think the real weakness of the defenders of Scripture is, that they do not really believe in its perfection, they yield something to their adversaries. If it be Divine, I cannot yield what is Divine. If it be not Divine, I have lost all Scripture. If I believe it Divine I seek the Divine meaning, and I shall be helped to discover it, and wait till I do. The moment you compromise, you are off the ground on which the Bible is of any value; or that contending for it is of any consequence whatever.

W. There I agree with you, and I think that, for Christians, these attacks will be of great value in this respect. For even Orthodox persons were very loose in their estimate of God's Word, and of inspiration. The Divine authority of God's Word, and the present action of the Holy Ghost were not really believed in.

H. An unconverted man cannot spiritually recognize either. He may be brought up with respect for the Word of God, and it is a very great mercy. But his own thoughts, when he thinks, must be human as to it when he comes to the point, and he has none else. When he 'has set to his seal that God is true,' all this is changed. But we will now take up Matthew.

W. If you please. What is the aspect in which Christ is presented in this Gospel, as you suppose? What the ways and dealings of God as presented in it?

H. The Emmanuel, Jehovah-Messiah, promised and prophesied of, presented to Israel but rejected, and, thus, rejected Israel making way for the Church and the kingdom; but all in earthly or Jewish connection; from that point of view. Hence, as in John, the final scene is in Galilee, and there is no ascension. Let us now go through its general structure as the evidence of special design; of a design which has Divine largeness of view and object. It begins with the roots of promise to come to the promised seed. Abraham, David, Christ. There are none of the lovely details of the state of the poor and godly remnant in Israel which we find in Luke, but simply the accomplishment of prophecy in the miraculous birth of Jesus, whose name was to be the expression of the coming of Jehovah to save His people. Next we have the false king seeking to thrust Him out, the Gentiles having come to own Him, God's wondrous testimony according to prophecy, and God providing, when once Jesus was thus owned, for the non-fulfilment of the blessing in legal Israel then, but a recommencing their history in His Son called out of Egypt. All this in Bethlehem, according to prophecy. The result is, that He is cast out into Galilee among the poor of the flock, to be brought up as the separated one from among His people. Next comes the voice foretold in the wilderness to announce the coming of Jehovah calling for repentance to meet Him, disowning right by birth from Abraham as sufficient. They must meet God. The fan was there to cleanse His floor (Israel), the axe already at the root of the trees. John recognizes the glory of the person of Jesus, but Jesus takes

His place according to Ps. xvi. among the poor in spirit, and godly ones among the people, the excellent of the earth: there He is owned as Son of God and anointed, and sealed with the Holy Ghost for His service in the earth. Then He is tempted and put to the test, and answers by passages from Deut., the book which contemplated Israel, not in legal order, but under a Divine claim of obedience. John is cast into prison, and Jesus begins His ministry and carries it on, on the same footing among the people as John, and begins to gather disciples to Himself. The last three verses give a general account of all His service in Galilee, preaching the glad tidings of the kingdom, and, by a display of power in goodness, drawing the attention of the whole country. Thereupon, that there might be no mistake, He sits down and declares to His disciples, but in the audience of the crowd, who they were that would enter into the kingdom, and on what principles. This is the sermon on the mount. Israel was in the way with Jehovah to judgment. If he did not come to agreement he would, as to earthly government, be cast into prison and remain till all was paid. Note, that rejection is supposed for the disciples, v. 10, 11. It is the kingdom of heaven, an expression peculiar to Matthew: that is, the rule of the kingdom is not on earth, but in heaven, enlarged, when the full result is seen (Matt. xiii.), into the Father's kingdom and the kingdom of the Son of Man, a name which Christ takes on His rejection as the Christ, and always gives Himself, and which is the passage from the prophecy of Him in Ps. ii., in which character He was rejected and the kingdom not now set up, to His character in Ps. viii., in which He is head over all things. The special characteristics of the sermon on the mount are what is called the spirituality of the law, the claim of a sanctifying view and obedience, and the revelation of the Father's name. In a certain sense this part of the Gospel gives His whole position in Israel. After the sermon on the mount we have details fully bringing out the display of Emmanuel, and the effect on Israel, and the opening the door to Gentiles. These we will go briefly through. We shall see that it passes withal directly on to dealing with the people in the last days in connection with what was then going on. In cleansing the leper He shows Himself as exercising Jehovah's power in Israel, and yet subject to the law of Moses. In healing the Centurion's servant with a word we find Him owned as the Divine Disposer of all things; and He takes occasion by this faith, not found in Israel, to declare the bringing in of Gentiles to sit down with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the children of the kingdom of Israel after the flesh being shut out. These great principles being established, we have His present condition, the blessed fulfiller of Isaiah liii., and an outcast in Israel, the Son of Man, but one for whom all must be given up. Next a picture of the result of being with Him, to man's eye a storm, which left no hope—at any rate they were in the same ship with Jesus—but He who seemed asleep (and was undisturbed by all) with a word commands all the elements; thus graciously rebuking their want of faith. In the country of the Gergesenes His word dispels all the power of Satan; but occasion is given to display this power in the unclean, the swine—a figure, I have no doubt, of Israel's subsequent history. At any rate those who have seen this power in Him, when fully informed, got rid of Him. Thus, all His power, and Israel's and the Gentiles' history in connection with it, have been displayed. Note, herein, the beautiful perfect display of the truth in the first case, Jehovah alone cleansed the leprosy. The leper saw His power, but doubted, at least, His goodness, could not reckon on it. Jesus, in words which God alone has a right to use, declares His grace, "I will;" but if one touched a leper he was unclean; but His holiness and nature were such, He could exercise His love to the uttermost in the midst of evil, undefiled and undefileable. And He touches him, and says, "I will." Jehovah, whom none could defile, a man to bring perfect love in power to the vilest.

W. How a few words, a single act, in these Divine records carries a volume of truth. How they prove their Divine character by it. It has, we cannot doubt an instant, a Divine Author, and a Divine subject. Much as your explanation interests me, the simple fact in the history you speak of says more than volumes of any explanation.

H. In truth, it does. The soul taught of God is in contact with Divine power in the Word. We may, by God's grace, serve as finger posts to it. He makes us, and it is gracious, helpful to one another; but all must be learnt with God. We will proceed. In ix. Christ is the Jehovah of Psa. ciii. He forgives and heals at the same time. Next He abounds in grace and calls the vilest, comes as a physician to call sinners, not the righteous; nor can He put this new power of grace into the old bottles of Judaism. In the rest of the chapter, a picture, I do not doubt a moment, of God's ways in Israel, He comes to intercept death. When there was individual faith in the crowd of Israel, power went out to heal; but really the object of His compassion was dead before He came. Resurrection must restore Israel. And so it will be with them. Owned as Son of David, He opens the blind eyes and opens the dumb mouth to praise God. Such was His work in Israel; but the Pharisees, the nation in its legal pride, committed itself fatally, and ascribed the Divine power to Satan. Awful word! But patient compassion was not exhausted, and Jesus-Jehovah went healing everywhere, had compassion on the shepherdless multitudes, saw the harvest plenty and the labourers few, directing His disciples to pray the Lord of the harvest He would send out labourers. This He does in the next chapter, but exclusively in Israel. The twelve are sent out, but the terms of their mission extend, without taking the Church into account at all, to the time of Christ's coming again. They are sent out in the midst of a hostile people, seeking the remnant, the worthy in Israel, and forbidden to go to Gentiles or Samaritans. But, if rejected, judgment would come. He goes on to the time when the Spirit would be come, and till the time when the Son of Man would be come. They had called the Master of the house Beelzebub (showing His estimate of the character Israel thus took), how much more His servants. But He encourages them by every promise, and especially the Spirit's help, and declares that all done to them would be considered as done to Him. This remarkable chapter shows the Lord, as we have seen the prophets before, passing over here from His first coming unbrokenly to the last days, leaving out wholly the present period—for He forbids any gospel to Gentiles. The patience of Christ continued to deal with Israel; but, in a certain sense, this was a closing testimony; I mean as to its character and nature. This is supposed to continue, as we have said, or, rather, not to be completed till He came. What follows in the Gospel discusses the moral character of His rejection, showing where rest was to be found, and, afterwards, what would come in on His rejection. Thus, in xi., on the inquiry by John, the character of His mission, and their reception of it, and of His own, and their reception of that, is unfolded, reproaching the cities with their unbelief, but showing rest in Himself for the weary; and that the truth was, all was given to Him the Son; He alone knew the Father, and could reveal Him; and He was the Son, none at all could know Him but the Father Himself. But He did reveal the Father to those who came to Him. He then shows the triumph of mercy over sacrifice—that a rejected David had eaten the show-bread, and that the priests profaned the Sabbath in the temple, and a greater than the temple was there. The seal of Israel's covenant must give place to the Son of Man. The same point is again insisted on with the Jews, and their whole system judged. This was an all-important point. It was setting the whole system aside for grace. His silent and unobtrusive character is declared, but, when the people own Him Son of David, the Pharisees repeat their blasphemy, and this leads to the formal judgment of the nation, and a prophecy of their last estate: that as the unclean spirit (of idolatry) had gone out, it would come back, with seven worse ones, to Israel. Then, on His mother and brethren, the links with Israel according to the flesh, coming, He will not own them, but only what is the fruit of His own word. This is fully unfolded in xiii. There the Lord takes the character of a Sower, one who does not seek fruit from what is already planted, but brings with Him what is to produce it. Then, in the six following parables, propounds the character and forms the kingdom of heaven would take while the King was hidden, and had not taken to Him His great power and reigned: in three its outer aspect to the multitude, in three its inner to the disciples. Its character as kingdom of the Father and of the Son of Man is given at the close. They are things new and old, the new unlooked-for character of what had been told of in prophecy, which a Scribe would already know. In what follows we have the signs of the closing scene—John Baptist is beheaded, and the Lord retires. But, followed by the multitude, His compassions still continue. He acts as the Jehovah of promise, and satisfies the poor with bread; but then retires even from His disciples, and, returning to them, shows that He walks as on dry ground where they are tossed about, and can give power to faith to do it. All here depends on keeping the eye fixed on Jesus. Peter could have walked on a smooth sea no better than on a rough one. When they were in the ship the wind ceased. Who with any sense can doubt this was significant? Israel dismissed, Christ alone on high, His disciples tossed about, yet taught to walk on the water to come to Him. When in the ship all is peace, and come to land (Gennesaret), that world out of which He had been once expelled, they worship Him there. xv., We have the principles of the kingdom; truth in the inward parts contrasted with ordinances; man's heart evil, but grace going out to the vilest of an accursed race, where there was faith. The Lord again feeds the multitude, the fact having a distinct character, which for the present I pass by. In xvi., leaving the adulterous generation, the Church is revealed, founded on His being the Son of the living God,—as such He had never before been owned, it was proved in resurrection; and also the kingdom of heaven, whose administration was entrusted to Peter. This leads to the clear announcement to His disciples that He must be rejected, and die. At this moment, consequently, He charges them to say no more that He is the Christ, the character in which He is presented to Israel. In xvii. the glory of the kingdom is revealed. But the disciples even could not profit by the blessing and power then present, and He was soon to leave that generation. He owns His disciples as, with Him, sons of the Great King; but, not to offend, submits as yet to the temple's demands. In xviii., we have the spirit, and flesh-judging principles, of the kingdom. The meek and lowly, and little children, are on His heart; for now it was, not Christ to Israel, but the Son of Man come to save that which was lost: and the Church, not the synagogue, became the place of which within and without could be said. Forgiveness characterized the kingdom, but judgment when grace was not owned; and so it happened to Israel. We then get spiritual power, judging and holding flesh as dead, while the relations formed of God are fully maintained—the law, the way of life to the Jew, supposing it to be kept; but the state of the heart spiritually judged, and Christ to be followed. All this is showing the effect of bringing in new power, applied to what the law treated of. In relationships, flesh not being judged, the law had gone below the original order of God, which was restored, but new power brought in, to live wholly to God. The truth of life by law, on the other hand, abstractedly owned, but the state of the heart judged in respect of it; not merely outward conduct; and Christ the true test of this. All this is of vast importance at this moment of transition. Riches, instead of being a reward of righteousness in God's earthly government, were a snare to the heart as to its entrance into the kingdom of heaven; while giving up everything for Christ would surely not lose its reward; only man might judge amiss. It was a new thing where (xx.) all was grace, and fleshly claim of reward for so much ran athwart the ways of one giving in grace. The Lord then renews His announcement of His immediate rejection; and, James and John looking for a good place in Messiah's kingdom, the Lord shows them the Son of Man was to suffer, give His life a ransom, and they must take up the cross too; that was all He could give them, save as all was ordained of the Father. He that was least among them would be greatest. This closes the instruction. The closing history commences here with the blind man at Jericho, as in all three Gospels,—an additional evidence of a common plan, yet unquestionably not formed by the human authors,—and Christ in the presence of Israel takes the character of Son of David. He then rides in on the ass, according to prophecy, and is celebrated as Son of David coming in the name of the Lord. The fig-tree, the figure of Israel, is judged. And then, in succession, He judges virtually (each class coming up in succession to tempt Him) the chiefs of the nation, the whole nation being God's vineyard, who were at last rejecting the son sent for fruit according to the old system, here the kingdom of heaven according to grace is set forth (xxii.), on which He gathers the Gentiles, but judges when they are come in; then the Pharisees and Herodians as to their connection with the Gentile monarchies; then the Sadducees; then He takes out of the law its Divine and eternal essence, and by one question confounds the Pharisees as to how the Son of David could be David's Lord, and be taken up to God's right hand, which was just about to happen. This closes His intercourse with the nation. They had all passed in review before Him. In xxiii. He recognizes the seat of Moses, however, still, and His disciples' connection with it; owning still existing Judaism; but then judges in the severest way its state, declaring that their last hypocritical excuse would be taken away from them; that prophets and scribes (so he calls the Gospel witnesses here, as in connection with the people) would be sent to them, and thus the measure of their guilt be filled up, and their house be left desolate till the last days, when the nation would own Him that came in the name of the Lord. In chap. xxiv. the disciples are told of the destruction of the temple, and then their ministry on to the last days is spoken of to v. 14; then the last half week of Daniel's seventy weeks is referred to, at the close of which the Son of Man would come. The whole history of the Jews in Judæa, and the scattered remnant, is given to v. 31; thence to xxv. 31, we have practical warnings and parables as to the duty of the Church and saints while He is away; thence to the end of xxv. the judgment of the nations in the earth when He shall be returned. The historical close now comes—the attachment of Mary, the treachery of Judas, the closing of Christ's association with them (shown in not drinking of the wine then with them), till in a new way He drank it in His Father's kingdom, the millennial world to come. Kingdom of heaven and kingdom of my Father, the latter its character when He takes it in heavenly glory, are peculiar to this Gospel. Then we have fully the sorrows and sufferings of Gethsemane, but not what we found in John—only He could pray and ask His Father; but the Scriptures must be fulfilled. He is in communion with the Father, but the suffering, obedient man. So He answers when the high priest adjures Him, according to Lev. v., but even here refers to His being, from this<sup>2</sup> out, only known as Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, as He is now, or coming again in that character. The people give up Christ, and desire a murderer, and say, His blood be on us and on our children—their true judgment to this day. We have the details of His humiliation on the cross, too, though no stupifying Himself with the offered potion, but obedience to the end. It is marked that it is not by weakness He expires, but crying with a loud voice. But His death closed the whole system publicly, the veil was rent, the very characteristic of the Jewish state, where men had no access to God, and the bodies of saints (Jews) arose. At the close, it is only His connection with His disciples in Galilee, where He had connected Himself with the poor of the flock, that is noticed, and there is no ascension. Thus it fits in to the renewal of a place with Israel on earth when the time comes. The mission supposes this, and sends the Gospel out only to the nations; all power being His in heaven and in earth, they were to make disciples of them.

Now, no one can doubt that the whole course of this Gospel is marked by a character wholly its own, the revelation of Christ to the Jews as theirs, but rejected by them; and thus the dispensational substitution of other things, the Church and kingdom; while the connection of His disciples with Jewish things, only on a new footing, is distinctly marked and pursued to the last days, the Church being overlooked in this part.

W. Your review of it makes it very plain, and gives an entireness to it which greatly facilitates the seizing the sense of the different passages.

H. You will see, too, if you examine the passages, that the historical order is neglected, to put the events into a just succession, with a view to God's dealing with Israel. Where we have the same events in Mark and Luke, these, so far as Luke is chronological, follow the same historical order; but Matthew leaves it to give a distinct character to Christ's ministry; while in Luke, in the temptation, and from ix. exclusive, to the end of xviii., we have no chronological order at all, but events morally connected. I will touch now on the Gospel of Luke. The first two chapters are wholly Jewish; except the heavenly song of the angels, more so than any part of the Gospels. We have a most perfect picture of the state of the pious remnant, who knew and spake one to another; the priestly service, and God yet, in patience, blessing in connection with it, and the relationship Israel, or at least Judah, bore to the then

Gentile monarchy. John's ministry is brought in in connection with it, and Israel's rejection of him; but then, after this, Christ is genealogically traced as Son of Man to Adam. Hence grace, and His associations with man, with sinners, and the principles on which those associations rested, characterize henceforth all the Gospel. He is in the power of the Spirit, the moral temptation coming last in the wilderness. He begins His ministry by showing sovereign grace and blessing sent outside Israel (chap. iv.). We find Him often praying. He was so when He received the Holy Spirit like a dove; was so all night before choosing His Apostles; was so when He was transfigured. What He gives of the sermon on the mount speaks not of how people could enter, but of His disciples as separated actually to Him. We have not the dispensational change of Matthew xi., but only Wisdom is justified of her children; and then, what is not found elsewhere, the touching account, in contrast with the Pharisee, of one of these children of Wisdom, the woman in the city that was a sinner. In the country of the Gadarenes the details of one of the cured men given, a soul restored desiring to leave the world and be with Jesus, but sent back to tell of Him where He had been rejected. Fuller details of the associations of Moses and Elias with Christ in glory, searching judgment of self in all its shapes when He came down. In the mission of the twelve, none of the directions which confined it to Jews, nor those which continued it to the coming of the Son of Man. The different, and here historical order, I have alluded to. From hence to xviii. there is no chronology, but great moral principles; among the rest the lost sheep, the piece of money, and the prodigal son; the use of riches, and the insight into a moral world unfolding grace and heaven, and a total change, not of dispensation, but of moral system—from earthly government to grace and heavenly hope. The parable of the good Samaritan, to the same purpose—answering to the xiiiith. of Matthew. Before this we have only the sower and the different soils; none of the parables of the kingdom of heaven, nothing dispensational; but a moral closing warning as to how they heard. The prophetic warning as to the revelation of the Son of Man is given as a general warning to disciples, not in connection with anti-Christ and Jerusalem. The parable of pounds (not of so many talents) rests on individual responsibility, and reward is proportionate: in Matthew, only 'enter into the joy of the Lord,' for all alike. In the answer to the Pharisees, He introduces the life of the souls of all after death. In the prophecy answering partly to Matt. xxiv. we have definitely the then coming siege of Jerusalem, consequently no abomination of desolation, but the desolation of Jerusalem, till the end of the times of the Gentiles, and then the coming of the Son of Man. Christ's personal feelings are more brought out as a man in the passover. There is a strife for greatness even then. In Gethsemane there appeared an angel from heaven strengthening Him; the Lord turns and looks on Peter when the cock crows, a touching and deeply interesting circumstance, not elsewhere. Pilate and Herod are made friends, another deep moral trait. Here only, the conflict (agony) in Gethsemane is noticed, and His sweating, as it were, great drops of blood, presenting Him so deeply as the suffering man, more than the rejected Christ. The remarkable history of the thief's conversion, in which the happiness of a soul before the setting up of the kingdom, which last alone the thief expected, is revealed, and his being with Christ in paradise, the absoluteness of grace, and the efficacy of the cross. Then, while all the history of the women is thrown together in a few words, the history of Emmaus is very largely recounted, and He is known in the sign of death. Lastly, He assures their hearts that it is Himself. Repentance and remission is their Gospel, and they were to wait for the power of the Holy Ghost promised—and the Gospel being from heaven, was to begin at Jerusalem—the Jew first, and also the Gentile. Here we find, lastly, the Ascension, where Christ, as from Heaven, blesses them with outstretched hands, and praise became the portion of His saints. Now, though I have gone very rapidly through this Gospel, the character and design is as clear as that of Matthew.

W. My feeling is, that, from its nature it is clear, because, while Matthew is dispensational, the moral character of this is so very evident, Christ's connection with man, grace, the interest of the soul, the prodigal son or Gentile sinner, the praying of Christ, and the touching circumstances found in this Gospel alone, give it a character not to be mistaken. But the comparison of them all leaves no cloud upon the fact, and I feel what you say now; what a feeble idea a harmony is, and how utterly senseless the remark of Mr. Jowett is, that the connection of the same facts with others could not be of importance, because they were differently connected in different Gospels. Why it is the whole pith of the matter, and one chief thing which prints a special character on them. But what of Mark?

H. I have not much to say of Mark. It presents to us the prophetic service of Christ. Hence, we have not His birth, but it begins with the testimony of John, then of Christ. Its order, the historical one, in spite of patristic statement, is, as remarked, the same as St. Luke, where the latter follows any historical order. In the passage answering Matthew xiii., we have only the sower, and no parables of the Kingdom, save one in which he shows that Christ took personally part at the commencement, His prophetic service, and, after leaving it seemingly to itself, takes a personal part in the end at the harvest or judgment; and a second, in which the outward form of the Kingdom during His absence is shown. We have the call of the Apostles, I do not doubt, coincident with the sermon on the mount, which is not found in Mark, being the principles of the Kingdom whose character and dispensations are opened in Matthew. In Matthew we have the twelve only introduced afterwards, in exclusive connection with their mission to Israel, and reaching forward to the time when the Kingdom will be set up in power. I need not go further into the details of this Gospel, which is more rapid in its character, more of testimony than the unfolding of dispensations and dealings of God. But it seems to me that a special design is evident in each Gospel, not perhaps of the writer, but of the Spirit which indited them, because all concur to one common end, but each is independent and treats the same subject differently—each pursuing its own object; but, inasmuch just, as the same facts are differently connected, showing that each has a different one, yet all, by each pursuing a different one, completing a whole. The Prophet, the Son of David, the Son of Man in grace, the Son of God, are respectively brought out, and in a great measure brought out wholly by the same facts.

W. It seems to me most striking, and to have a very Divine character. For the design proves a designer; yet each independent document has a separate design of its own, and the general design is not from their writers, even if that of each particular document was, which I do not believe. There is a simplicity of relation which forbids me to think of a plan of composition, though I do not doubt the habits of thinking of the vessel were fitted to its task. It makes the Gospels a very important part of Scripture as to knowledge; though, I confess, the details of the Lord's life are the most attractive and blessed aspect of them.

H. May it ever be so. I have found that, led to occupy myself with the Epistles as divine reasonings on Christ's work and place now, to get peace for my soul; when I had it, my heart turned back to the Gospels to learn and feed on Him whose every footstep was light and grace. They are our constant food in this respect. I find I read Scripture two ways: as study, and as a child to learn in heart and conscience, as God speaking to me that I may be comforted, searched out, and taught, and listen to God. And the last is the most important and every one's; the former is more in the way of gift. Here we are studying it. Mark, too, that it is not each Gospel choosing its facts, marking thus the writer's design. Mr. Jowett's own theory, as of others, is that they had a common testimony, and, hence, the proof that the design came from a higher source is very strong indeed.

W. It requires to study the Gospels to have the proof of this, and happily souls enjoy and profit by them who never think of the difficulties presented or the answers to them. But, when they are studied, I do not think we can hesitate a moment in seeing the justice of what you say. It brings to my mind your old charge of superficiality. One finds that, when any thing is studied, the rationalists have remained wholly on the surface of things, and their crude difficulties disappear.

H. It is the beauty and blessedness of Scripture as the word of God to work by its own power, and convey, through grace, its divine contents to the heart. Hence, it does work, is blessed to the poor and ignorant, and to every simple mind which has received what is divinely given and found in it a certain proof of its divine nature, without ever perceiving the difficulties. All we do, who look into them, is to discover that they are trashy, and the fruit of minds who do not see beyond the surface. But the inquiry serves to show that we are looking into depths which prove that all of us are, comparatively speaking, at the surface of that which is of infinite depth, its waters always pure, and all, and always, ours. But we will return to our Essays. Mr. Jowett, after speaking of the Gospels, says: "If words have more than one meaning they may have any meaning." This may sound wise, but it is most perfect trash. I take an example. When Christ died, it is said the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom; and then the resurrection of the saints after His resurrection and their appearing in the city is noted. Now this rending of the veil has one meaning. It is the history of the fact, and means only that. Now, I say, such an assertion is as senseless and foolish as it can possibly be. The rending is ascribed to Christ's death, followed by resurrection of dead saints. The veil was the sign that God was hidden and could not be approached. Now, by Christ's death, He could be. The whole mighty change of dispensation was marked in it, and the full power of redemption in Christ's death. These senses are indeed ascribed to it in the Epistle to the Hebrews, in ix. and x. But they are evident. The talking of one meaning is simply folly, and if I speak of the uncertainty of interpretation, which of course is not infallible, am I to choose the judgment of an interpreter who has proved himself incapable of interpreting anything by embracing an evidently false and inapplicable principle, or of one who has a right one, though of course I must watch his use of it?

W. You may proceed, for the absurdity of their principle here is too evident to need a moment's hesitation. We are returning, too, to an old ground, that they are attacking Scripture, not interpreting it.

H. I do not think we have much more to examine, as much of the latter part of Mr. Jowett's Essay speaks of general principles which we have discussed already. However, we will run through it. The beginning of his Part 3 is merely that dread of rationalists and their power which makes him anxious to reduce Christianity to the level at which they will not object to it, which is no level at all, and which would make it not Christianity, but a most pitiable and despicable imposture, which every one, but one sufficiently intellectually and morally low to be a rationalist, would repel with scorn. Their incessant occupation to prove it such, and then explain it, only proves their degradedly low moral state, which would accept such a system, and that the fang of Divine truth is in their conscience, from which they cannot get themselves free. If Mr. Jowett rejects mere conventional Christianity and traditional interpretation, I have nothing against it. I can use criticism to get a pure text and real Christianity; but to get an imposture, and continue to use it, that I must leave to him. Nor will I use a double tongue to deceive myself, for I really do not suspect him of desiring to deceive others; such language I mean as this:—"They wish to preserve the historical use of Scripture as the continuous witness in all ages of the higher things in the heart of man, as the inspired source of truth, and the way to the better life." Now, whence did the higher things in the heart of man come? What does "inspired" mean here, "an inspired source of truth?" Any one would think it meant it had not come of the will of man, but that the Spirit of God had moved holy men of old to speak as they were moved by Him, and hence, that it was a source of truth. And note, we cannot take up Old and New Testament inspiration here as distinct. It is a "witness in all ages." Remember, then, we have been told that, "not for any of the higher or supernatural views of inspiration is there any foundation in the Gospels or Epistles." If he meant to shirk the Old Testament there, he cannot here. He speaks of the whole of Scripture, and we soon find what this ambiguous language means. I cannot here acquit Mr. Jowett of disingenuousness, though quite ready to admit that it is the influence of a lying system over his mind. We begin with an "inspired source of truth." Here you would think that an inspired source of truth must have its own proper and Divine authority. But we find a kind of half-way house of uncertain tones in the following words: "The purer the light in the human heart, the more it will have an expression of itself in the mind of Christ;" the explanation of which, though still in ambiguous language, really reduces the word simply to the higher things in the heart of man: "the individual soul" finds a "sympathy with its own imperfect feelings in the broken utterance of the Psalmist, or the Prophet, as well as in the fulness of Christ." Now, if it had said that the Psalms provide a Divine utterance for feelings imperfect man knew not how, or dared not, to express, when redemption was not fully known, I should have accepted it. For the unspeakable grace of God is shown in this: but for Mr. Jowett it is a pious person not inspired himself and imperfect, finding broken utterance of his own feelings in the higher things in the heart of man, i.e., in the utterance of others like himself. Sympathy there may be, but the Scriptures are worth nothing more than any Christian neighbour; only really that I, when on Christian ground, am to go back to Jewish; and lose wholly "the increasing purpose" of revelation, for I live in the light, and am to go back for the utterance of my feelings to those who had not got it. But we reach the home of this thought a little further on, what even the fulness of Christ is. "No one can form any notion of the power which Christianity might have, if it were at one with the conscience of man, and not at variance with his intellectual convictions." Here we have the truth. My state of mind is to be the measure of revealed truth. The "inspired source of truth" is to be tampered with till it be brought into harmony with it—nay, Christianity itself is. What the use of having a source of truth, or Christianity is, in that case, is, to me, perfectly unintelligible. I should have thought that an inspired source of truth must, by its statements, have judged the state of the conscience; that Christianity was something positive, which could only be itself, and was a Divine light, and Divine facts for the conscience; and if not that, an imposture and false; that if I am going to make it one with the conscience it ceases to be it at all. I cannot adapt a revelation to a faculty, because it is not then a revelation at all. It becomes a "gallus in campanili," "ceases to have any meaning at all," and to whose conscience is it to be conformed? It won't do to talk of conscience, i.e., a faculty of judging of good and evil; because, in fact, I judge it by something, some judgment has been formed, conscience has its measure, unless, it may be, in crimes, and even in that. One had thought the fulness of Christ was a perfect light and measure which judged all in man, and formed the conscience; that it was the rule of it. It appears this is all a mistake. There is a Christianity, but man's conscience, God knows whose, (the majority rejected Christ), is to be made the measure, and Christianity is to be adapted to it. A pretty Christianity we should have ; but, as I said, the statement is simple nonsense, because, when adapted, or if adaptable, then there is no such thing at all. But we have the system of the Essays. Christianity is no Divine or Divinely revealed religion. Talk of the fulness of Christ if you will, the hind let loose will give you goodly words. It is the result in the year one of the, till then, higher things of the human heart, which is to be adapted to the conscience of Mr. Jowett and his friends. We may condescend to allow God to give an inspired source of truth, only He must bend and make Himself and His religion one with Mr. Jowett's intellectual convictions. Why his next-door neighbour should not say the same I cannot tell, or an American Indian from a scalping party, or the Chinese, who are very particular in paying their debts the first of January, but have no scruple in robbing to do it, or throwing inconvenient daughters into the river ; why not the Chief Priests, who would not put the price of blood into the treasury, but had no scruple in buying it ? Conscience of man—convenient word ! what has it made of the world ? If I may give it, thus used, Iapetic interpretation, after Baron Bunsen, it is man's justifying his own thoughts, to please his own will, and subject everything Divine to it.

W. But I can hardly conceive how any one can make such a statement as Jowett's. It is so outrageous, not merely because man's conscience has been so corrupted and hardened, which is, though true, the weaker side of the argument ; but that it makes Christianity a mere paste to be suited to intellectual convictions ; that is, makes it nothing at all—not a revelation, not Divine, not truth (and yet calling it the fulness of Christ)—it is a pure and simple absurdity.

H. It is ; but we get exactly here what the system is. All previous adaptations of Christianity to other ages, that is corruptions, these writers hold for forms produced by the age, but their intellectual convictions, Christianity is to be made one with. They only deserve the name of man—their conscience is man—their intellectual convictions man. We see plainly, too, the road that has led them to this modest theory—“No one can form any notion from what we see around us of the power which Christianity might have if it were at one,” &c. Now people who feel that “what they see around them” is anything but what Christianity ought to be, which is not very difficult, and complaining and finding fault very easy, jump at this, and, having still faith in Christianity, they say, That is true; oh, if we had it in its purity. I agree largely and heartily with this feeling, and have this thirty years, and more. So when he talks of the Bible’s beauty being “freshly seen, as of a picture which is restored after many ages to its original state,” it is delightful. But when I hear that it is to be by making Christianity one with the conscience of man, I say, But that is not its original state, it is the state of your conscience, your present intellectual convictions as you call them. That is no rule by which I judge of Christianity; it is denying it and its use altogether. They have by conscience, when the ways of those professing Christianity have sunk below natural conscience, judged that state, and then not gone back to correct their own state by the original revelation, but have assumed their conscience and present intellectual convictions to be competent to judge of revealed Christianity, and the inspired Word itself. The reasoning is this, natural conscience has judged the corruption of Christianity around one, therefore it is the right judge of the Divine revelation which has been misused. But this is poor logic, and worse morality, in the highest sense of morality. There is a conscience which is disgusted at the hypocrisy of what bears the name of Christianity, but that does not make man’s intellectual convictions the measure of what revelation means. Speaking of a Christianity which can so be made one with the conscience of man, is saying, there never was any Christianity at all; if Christianity means a revelation from God, aye, a final revelation. If it be not, it is an imposition, and there is nothing to be adapted. But I am only showing the total fallacy of the ground Mr. Jowett stands on, and how in fact he got on it. We should only go over ground we have trodden, if I should remark how he urges, that from the Fathers till now—till the German rationalists and the seven Essayists—“they read the Scriptures in connection with the ideas which were kindling in the mind of their age.” It is singular to say of Luther and the like, “The words of Scripture suggest to them their own thoughts and feelings.” I thought, “the purer the light in the human heart, the more it will have an expression of itself in the mind of Christ;” so that I should have thought Luther and Calvin must have been perfect, if the words of Scripture thus suggest to them their own thoughts and feelings. But then that was their age, this is Mr. Jowett’s; so that Christianity must be one with his intellectual convictions. A pretty thing Christianity must be, by way of “an inspired source of truth, and way to a better life.” I certainly never read more incomparable nonsense; and yet flowing from a conscience greatly offended with the inconsistencies of Christendom, but continuing in false self-confidence, and in connection with the lowest and most contemptible system that ever a man drudged through to find a crambe repetita of infidel stupidity and pretensions, and that is, German rationalists’ comments on Scripture.

W. But is there not research in these German writers?

H. There is. If I seek mere verbal criticism, they are very useful. Not to be trusted, “because they read the Scriptures in connection with the ideas kindling in the mind of their age,” but still, as compiling materials most useful. But if I took a man who bought and hewed my wood to explain the nature of heat, or the tissues even of the wood, I should not get far on; only that the rationalist pretends to do it, as my woodman would not. But I speak of their comments and deductions, not their research. We have spoken of the principles of interpretation, and I only remark, that when Mr. Jowett speaks of design, what he says is utterly false—‘There is no more design than in Plato or Homer’—‘no proof of any artificial design.’ Now only remark how God is wholly left out here. There is, I am satisfied, unless it be, perhaps, in the form of the Book of Job, not so much design as in Plato, as regards the writer; artificial, none at all; unless Job. But, supposing there is not more than in Plato, but God be the designer, what an immense fact that would be; how deep and Divine the design must be. Now, with the usual superficiality of these writers, Mr. Jowett does not even take that into consideration. I could understand his denying it; but to leave it out is stupidity. As to human design extending beyond a book, or even an epistle, it is out of the question. The authors were mostly different, and of widely different ages; and where one, as, for example, Paul, his writings are chiefly occasional, and a general design equally out of the question. Hence the only real question is, Is there a design in it? Mr. Jowett has not even found out the question. That there is, I do not think any intelligent person who has read the Scriptures carefully, could doubt an instant. I believe every book of Scripture finds its place, like the parts of a dissected map, and give a whole which proves its own completeness. His next rule is itself just as superficial and false, and assumes that there is no inspiration. “Each writer, each successive age, has characteristics of its own.” That I fully admit, as does every one who has read them. In deigning to use instruments, God did not mean to destroy them. He gave them talents according to their ability. “These differences are not to be lost in the idea of a Spirit from whom they proceed, or by which they were overruled.” Even this I do not quarrel with, though its animus be evil. Its effect is to swamp inspiration in the differences of style, but I admit its terms—"The differences are not to be lost." Be it so. But now the conclusion—Mr. Jowett is, I think, the most illogical writer I ever came across—"And, therefore, illustration of one part of Scripture by another should be confined to writings of the same age and the same authors, except where the writings of different ages or persons offer obvious similarities." Now every one, except Mr. Jowett, knows that the later writers were thoroughly imbued with, their minds wholly formed by, what preceded; the prophets by the law, and the New Testament by the Old. That the New Testament, far the most dissimilar, is yet built in every thought on the basis of the Old. Though the truths and state be wholly new, and in a certain sense set aside the whole system of the Old, yet nine-tenths of its language is unintelligible, unless we are versed in the Old. This is the more remarkable indication of the one Divine mind, because it was, as a system, the total setting aside of the Old. The Cross made an impassable gulph between the Old and New, yet confirmed and adopted the Old; and the Old predicted and prepared the way of the New, which yet set it aside. As Paul says—"Now the righteousness of God, apart from law, χωρις νομου being witnessed by the law and the prophets." Now, this remarkable phenomenon stands alone. Not that one system cannot borrow from another, but no two systems on earth stand in the same relation as these do to one another. The principle of Mr. Jowett is the most futile of thoughts, contradictory of all the facts of the case. But his logic is no better. Because the differences, which we admit, are not to be lost in the idea of a Spirit from whom they proceed, or by which they are overruled, therefore they are not to be illustrated from one another. Now, if they proceed from one Spirit, I should, admitting the differences, expect them to throw, necessarily, light on one another—or even if one Spirit overruled them. Can the Spirit of God, that is, God, make an opening series of Divine thoughts which, communicated by different persons, are to issue in one great culminating fact,—the revelation of Himself in Christ,—can there be “increasing purpose of revelation” brought out by these Divinely accredited persons, overruled by one Spirit, without one part clearing up another? Be it that I first take each part by itself in its own context, an excellent and important rule which cannot be too strongly enforced; but is not so much as an illustration (I do not like the term), a clearing up of one part by another, in the increasing purpose of revelation to be found, if all proceed from one Spirit? If Mr. Jowett means that it does not so proceed, let him say so honestly, and deny the Scriptures as “an inspired source of truth;” but to speak of a Spirit from which they proceed, or by which they are overruled, and that with an increasing purpose, and that therefore we are not to illustrate one part by another, because each writer has characteristics of his own, is to say the characteristics are not overruled, and that I am not to look at the one Divine power from which all proceeds, but only at the particular forms in which this one mind is conveyed; and this is just the system, and a more illogical and absurd one, upon the face of it, cannot be conceived. I admit, again, that I believe this inconsistency flows from Mr. Jowett’s feeling it does come from one Spirit. But a double-minded man is unstable in all his ways, and hence his exception as to obvious similarities. For, if this be of style, the exception hardly exists. After the captivity, the prophets went back to purer Hebrew, and there are a few resemblances of no importance; but if this saving have any meaning, it is as much as to say, Do not say that there is any light during the day, except when the sun is up. This inconsistency of Mr. Jowett is regularly shown in a subsequent paragraph: “They have also a sort of continuity . . . and at length the idea arises in our minds of a common literature, a pervading life, an everlasting law.” No God, no Spirit, of course, in it. But to proceed: “It may be compared to the effect of some natural scene, in which we suddenly (!) perceive a harmony, or picture, or to the imperfect appearance of design which suggests itself in looking at the surface of the globe. That is to say, there is nothing miraculous or artificial in the arrangement of the books of Scripture; it is the result, not the design, which appears in them when bound in the same volume; or, if we like so to say, there is design, but a natural design which is revealed to after ages." Did you ever in your life read anything like this extraordinary sentence? Were not God shut out so carefully, I should go round and round it, like the suddenly perceived beautiful picture, to admire I hardly know what, except Professor Jowett's naïveté. You cannot accuse such a man of any dishonesty. You do not like to accuse him of anything—bonum virum facile crederes magnum libenter. And who knows what he would make if he believed God had something to do with Scripture! Here you have him suddenly perceiving what every one else has believed these thousand years, a thought sanctioned by the Lord and His Apostles, but combated by Mr. Jowett till now; but, thank God, felt. And what is the effect it is hard to tell, in the pêle mêle of the phrase. This continuity, this harmony, appears in them when bound in the same volume. That is profound. But then the idea,—what is to be done,—arises in our mind, (i.e., you cannot help seeing it) of a common literature, a pervading life, an overruling law. I suppose that did not come from being bound in the same volume; next "it is the result;" I suppose, of something,—that Mr. Jowett is silent upon, only it is the result, not the design, which appears in them when bound in the same volume. But the result of what? But, if we like to say so, it is design; but a natural design which is revealed to after ages. Now, I grant the revelation to after ages, because, between you and I, the design of this harmonious whole could not be seen till the harmonious whole was there. But though revealed to after ages, the design, I suppose, was before it began—αρχη της θεωριας τελος της πραξεως. But then I would suggest that, if there is a design, there must be a Designer of the whole; for the design is found in the whole before any of it was there. It proceeded from one Spirit, and was overruled by one. Who was the Designer of this which suggests one overruling law, the harmony of our picture? Ah! here is silence; nay, worse than silence, it was "a natural design." What does that mean?

W. Well, I really don't know—a natural design—I do not see the connection of the ideas.

H. In one sense no human being can. It is a design which has no designer, but has grown up naturally, a mere contradiction of terms, a fortuitous concurrence of atoms to make a tree. It means that, if anything grows naturally, God is to be shut out as the cause. And he would have Scripture so considered, lest God should be believed to be in it. He will—the Lord deliver him from it—at the cost of nonsense, shut out God. For, if natural means springing up without a cause, it's a contradiction in terms to say a natural design; and it is Atheism. But you have a clue to it: "There is nothing miraculous or artificial," he tells us, "in the arrangement of the books of Scripture." Now, arrangement of the books is of his usual looseness. Is it of the contents or of the books themselves? But, take it any way, there is nothing miraculous or artificial, i. e., neither of God or man, in it; it grew up naturally, yet was a design, not of God's, not of man's. Of whose? a result which appears when bound in a volume! Did you ever see a man labouring and toiling under a weight upon his spirit, in a labyrinth of his own mind, like this? And let me add, if I see a lovely and harmonious picture in nature, do I say it's a result? Was there no Designer, no Creator, no one who formed and made the lilies of the field, which the Blessed One admired? Did God clothe the grass, which to-day is in the field, and to-morrow cast into the oven, and not order, and arrange, and form His Word, which abideth for ever, and by which, as by the sword out of Christ's mouth, men will be judged in the last day? I see a creation around me, a harmony, aye, "the imperfect appearance of design," in looking at the surface of the globe, perhaps at the starry heavens. I read the Apostle telling me that His eternal power and Godhead who has ordained them are clearly seen, κατανοούμενα, by the things that are made, so that men are without excuse. To Mr. Jowett it is a result, and he uses the comparison to make out a natural design which grows up where God and man are not. Yet he cannot deny design in a harmonious whole, and, to shut out God from Scripture, uses an expression, "a natural design," which is simple nonsense; while the object of it is simple and clear, from the exclusion of 'miraculous and artificial,' that is, God and man. Design means, I cannot help perceiving God. Natural means, I will not at any rate have Him. And see the foolishness of even that comparison. What is the analogy between a picture in nature and thoughts of men, and more, the thoughts of men as to Christ, and all that God has told us in Scripture? Do they grow up like a tree whose seed is in itself after its kind? Is there nothing moral in them, nothing but natural consequences, no communications from God at all more than to a tree? Is that Mr. Jowett's idea of natural? If not, am I to be guided, as the way to life, by mere human thoughts in dark ages? Who was Christ? Or, if God has revealed His thoughts, am I to have them spoiled, perhaps perverted, by human agency, and only so? Is He to give His Son to work redemption to deliver me, and I only to know it in such an Oriental garb, and so mixed up with the ideas of the age, that I cannot tell what this Son or this redemption is? To say even that man, with religious thoughts, conflicting thoughts, Divine thoughts, human thoughts, grows up like a tree, which has one unchangeable nature, is rank nonsense. And to call these thoughts a revelation, or the inspired source of truth, if it be not God's own account of this, is trifling with words and things, and with the things of God too. The very breaks Mr. Jowett speaks of, prove the folly of his thoughts. The harmony of a picture is a whole. But, as he says, we have centuries of Judaism without a word: nigh 2,000 years of Christianity in their turn. If Scripture be a harmonious whole, it is something else, then, than natural growth and development. For the development was interrupted for centuries in Judaism, and has ceased for near 2,000 years, so that the harmonious whole must belong to the book in itself. But a design, which harmony denotes, means that there is a designer, and, if a designer, a designer of the whole. And this says all. For, let it grow like nature, which is nonsense as to a revelation, or let each word be dictated to a machine, if the design be accomplished, the perfect expression of the mind of the designer is there. Did God (every word being according to His design, or there is not harmony if I look far enough) mean to teach me exactly the truth by His design or not? Has He formed the Scripture so as to do so, supposing I am willing to learn? If so, all this reasoning is the pretension of a candle in sunshine to show us the sun, and clear up by it what light is.

W. But, if you look at the details in a picture, you lose the harmony.

H. To be sure I do, but I learn what makes it. But only think of the language of this sentence. There is a harmony, an overruling law, but a result, not a design, which appears when bound in one volume, yet a design, but a natural design. Did you ever see such a rocking of the mind, as the hull of a ship with no sail filled, no rudder to guide; every contradictory thought brought together, following each other like the waves; the beating about of the mind sensible of the force of what it is in, but without God, and unwilling to let Him in?

W. Well, I never did.

H. That there is progress in revelation, and in man under revelation, no Christian child denies, or is ignorant of. But, what has that to do with the authority and source of the revelation so given, and the account it affords of man under it all? The true present result in a Church, they are wholly ignorant of, and choose to ignore the facts. Mr. Jowett says, "But of all mankind, whom He restores to His Father and their Father, to His God and their God." Now that it is for all the world, is true, but Christ says this to His disciples only. 'Not to all the people, but to witnesses chosen before.' Of course those that believed came into it; but disciples are there, not mankind. The vagueness of all these men's thoughts is singular. And it is a moral vagueness; for it supposes men to be in a Divine position, without one Divine quality.

W. The whole series of the Essays give me the idea of very unformed minds; like half-fledged birds got out of their nest, they attempt the air, but it is not flying. Neither the safety of the quiet goose, nor the liberty of the fledged wing; they tumble instead of flying, because they attempt to fly.

H. I leave you to your simile, but that is the necessary effect of man's mind pretending to occupy itself with Divine things in its own strength. I will turn now to some passages in which we have specimens of Mr. Jowett's interpretation, to show how in every respect, as to the connection of the passages, the force of the statements, and the moral judgment of good and evil, his system has made him utterly incapable and incompetent as an interpreter. First, Romans iii. 19, he attacks St. Paul as false in logic, as arguing from a particular to the universal; the blunder is simply Mr. Jowett's. The Apostle had already proved the Gentiles as wholly reprobate morally. But he could not deny that, however evil, as he had shown, the Jews had special privileges, and particularly the oracles of God. They boasted that the law was theirs, and theirs only. All right, says the Apostle; what the law says it says to them who are under the law; but it says that there is none righteous, that those it spoke to were together become abominable; but it spoke to Jews, therefore they were such by their own confession, and every mouth was stopped, and all the world become guilty. He had fully proved the Gentile so, and the Jew did not question it; only sought to justify himself and rest on his privileges. You have them, I admit, says the Apostle, particularly the oracles of God; they are yours, speak to you: let us hear them, hear what they say to you; you are abominable, there is every mouth stopped. Nothing could be more conclusive with a Jew pleading privilege. Mr. Jowett, not having understood one atom of the argument, which is evident to a child, sees only the Apostle applying what is said avowedly to the few, to all the world.

Next, he takes Rom. i. 16—18, and says they, (“the series of inferences which follow one another,”) are for the most part different aspects or statements of the same truth. Now, γὰρ, with Paul, is very frequently no inference from what precedes, but from a principle he has laid down, or which is the ground on which his mind is going in argument. Thus, “because” (i. 19), “because” (21), are two reasons for the same thing, namely, that the wrath of God was revealed; first, the rejection of the witness of creation; secondly, the abandoning the knowledge of God when they had it. So continually in Paul’s writings, though what the ‘for’ refers to is not always so on the surface. But further saying that 16—18 are different aspects or statements of the same truth, has no sense. He is ready to preach the Gospel at Rome; for, however proud and great the city and people may be, &c., or whatever it may be, he is not ashamed of the Gospel, for it is the power of God to salvation. That is verse 16, and tells why he is not ashamed; next follows why it is the power of God to salvation; because God’s righteousness was revealed in it when man had none; and thus it became available to faith, whether it was of Jew or Gentile, being on the principle of faith. But what made all this necessary? How came it that it was by faith to any, Jew or Gentile, and so to all? There was another great truth that had to be remembered. It was not now a government of God in earthly judgments on the one family God had known, but God's wrath from heaven morally, He being fully revealed, against all inconsistent with His nature, be the guilty ones where they may; and particularly, as in the case of the Jew (and now of the Christian), those who hold the truth, but in unrighteousness. "For the wrath" is not a direct inference from what precedes, but from the whole state of the case. All this, he says, is brought out, and my service and object; for, &c. To say that his not being ashamed of the Gospel, the revelation of the righteousness of God, and the revelation of the wrath of God, is a statement of the same truth, could be found, I suppose, in a rationalist alone, and from the enlarged light he alone possesses. Having referred to these three first instances of proofs of fitness for directing how to interpret, I leave all this part, in which are some just remarks, with evidence of utter immaturity as a whole, but nothing that requires particular notice. But one statement I would advert to, simply because Mr. Jowett is advancing human experience to overthrow the essential point of all Paul's teaching, which he advances distinctly as Divine truth, against the false conclusion which Mr. Jowett draws. Logical "opposition is one of ideas only, which is not realized in fact. Experience shows us not that there are two classes of men animated by two opposing principles, but an infinite number of classes or individuals, from the lowest depth of misery and sin to the highest perfection of which human nature is capable, the last not wholly good, the worst not entirely evil. But the figure or mode of representation changes these differences of degree into differences of kind." Nor does Mr. Jowett fear to include in this logical opposition even the setting the sheep on His right hand and the goats on His left; so that not even judgment is to separate the evil and the good. Here it is resting on man's judgment of good from outward conduct, in defiance of His who searches the heart. It is defying the sentence of God. It is perfectly clear that the foundation truth of Scripture is that man is a sinner; not that men are criminals, but that "or even as this publican," is the proof of a hard heart, not of a good man. That he who thanks God he is not as other men, is a Pharisee. It was Christ's reproach that He was the Friend of publicans and sinners. He avowed it—He did not come to call the righteous. The Apostle's whole doctrine is in the most striking way, not as logical opposition, but as laboriously proved doctrine, that there is no difference, that men by nature are children of wrath; that all are gone out of the way, and need redemption and to be justified by blood. The Lord declares that the publicans and harlots were nearer the kingdom of God than those who take the ground Mr. Jowett does. The Apostle insists that they that are in the flesh cannot please God. He knew that in him, that is in his flesh, dwelt no good thing. God would not curse the ground any more for man's sake, for all the imaginations of the thoughts of his heart were only evil, and that continually. The true gardener knows a thistle with two leaves over ground, as well as with mischievous ripened seed. There is many and many a person in the depths of misery and sin that has juster thoughts of God and of the truth than Mr. Jowett; many a judge upon the bench with a harder heart than the passionate criminal he is judging; many a Pharisee ready to cast a stone (aye, at Christ Himself morally), till he meets Christ's eye, that goes away, to save his character not his conscience, from His eye, and leaves one undoubtedly guilty to the Lord of mercy. There is no good in sin, that is certain, but less in covering it. But, besides, Mr. Jowett's paragraph destroys all the moral doctrine of Scripture. A man, all men, must be converted, must repent, must be born again; has not life, if he has not the Son of God. All is lost on Mr. Jowett. It is not his experience. And even this is moral blindness. His experience, and nobody else's, in looking at this world, tells the secrets of hearts, the temptations, conflicts of the one in misery, or the cold, heartless, selfishness of the other decent and respectable moralist. The history of Christianity, the doctrine of Christianity, the path of the Christ of God, are all the formal, express, and careful denial of Mr. Jowett's doctrine; the denial of it, because that doctrine was the ruinous self-deception of men's souls. Mr. Jowett seeks to make words also uncertain; and, in order to avoid admitting that religion shifts with shifting modes of thought and speech—for the existence of truth does not seem to cross his mind, or enter as a possibility into his conception—he makes any fixity of thought immaterial to Christianity. What is Christianity, then? The statement that it is life, and not doctrine, while true, rightly used, is of no force,—that is a doctrine,—nor to say it is a revelation of God, because the revelation when stated is what is meant by a doctrine. To justify this looseness, he refers to a commentator, who appears willing to peril religion on the literal truth of such an expression as, "We shall be caught up to meet the Lord in the air;" and asks, Would he be equally ready to stake Christianity on the literal meaning of the words, "Where their worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched?" On the truth, certainly; on the literal meaning not; because not being as careless and loose as Mr. Jowett, he would know that one was a positive distinct revelation by the Word of the Lord how certain things should happen, when some confusion had arisen in the minds of the saints, and the other is an avowed figure, taken from the end of Isaiah. But rationalists soar above all the necessities of careful inquiry. They doubt of what God says, and pronounce by their own thoughts, and all is settled. They know how to quote and apply the Old Testament better than the Lord and the Apostles. "Hardly any" (quotation), "probably none," which they have made, "is based on the original sense or context." It is one who has found out that sin is an intermediate between good and evil, and that sheep on the right hand and goats on the left is only a logical opposition, who can alone quote properly. But what is the proof that the Apostles and the Lord are wrong, and Mr. Jowett right? It is, that the way of quoting is in agreement with the ideas of the age or country in which it was written. That is, if it were so, those formed by the Old Testament and the teaching of the prophets; and here, mark, all superintendence, all care, of the Holy Spirit is denied. And what is the conclusion? First, it is a reason for not insisting on the applications which the New Testament makes of passages in the Old, as their original meaning; and, secondly, it gives authority and precedent for the use of "similar applications in our own day;" which have thus as much authority and truth. Nor does he deny this last use to be sanctioned by the Lord and His Apostles; so that the Lord Himself has sanctioned, according to Mr. Jowett, the total perversion of the Old Testament, though declaring it to be the Word of God, and that it must be fulfilled. But how fulfilled, if it was applied wrong? Which was fulfilled—the sense it had, or the sense the Lord (may He forgive me for saying such a thing) took wrongly out of it? These Scriptures witnessed of Him. But, if they were all wrongly quoted and misapplied when cited as witnessing of Him, how could this be? The confidence of these men in their own stupid opinions, in presence of the declarations of the Lord, borders on blasphemy; save that their looseness and carelessness, and the absence of all inquiry and research in what they say, make their emptiness an excuse for what would be otherwise wicked. Where they have lived, I know not; one would think among the traditions of the darkest corners of the land—for their efforts at looseness are only occasioned by traditional applications, exploded by every one who has carefully studied Scripture—only that they have given up God and Scripture with these traditions, as I have often seen poor Roman Catholics do, who, when they gave up taking a bit of bread for God, for a time had no God at all, believed nothing at all. And note, we make this very same use of Scripture, and show it is no perversion at all! And, while insisting that Scripture has only one meaning, it is curious to see how he would let it loose on his side the country. "Where, for our example, our Saviour says, 'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall set you free;' it is not likely that these words would have conveyed to the minds of the Jews who heard Him, any of the perplexities of doubt or inquiry." Nor to anybody else in their senses, I should think; because the context is, "If you continue in my word, then shall ye be my disciples indeed, and you shall know," &c. "Yet we cannot suppose that our Saviour, were He to come again on earth, would refuse thus to extend them." Now, the blessed Lord's words seem to me very simple, for His time and every time. Divine truth sets a man, when really received, morally free. He is not a slave, as he is when he is a sinner—lost. I suppose I am unfortunate; I avow I do not understand what Mr. Jowett means by "conveying any notion of the perplexities of doubt or inquiry." Does that mean, that setting free is giving doubt and inquiry, or delivering them from it who are doubting or inquiring?

W. Well, I really don't know. I do not understand them either. How knowing the truth can give doubt and inquiry, I do not understand; nor how the words should convey notions of doubt or inquiry: I am as much at sea as you.

H. I suppose he must mean, by what follows, freed from doubt; of course, knowing the truth does free from doubt. But continuing in Christ's word is not exactly what he speaks of. He says: "The Apostle Paul, when describing the Gospel, which is to the Greek foolishness, speaks also of a higher wisdom, which is known to them who are perfect. Neither is it unfair for us to apply this passage to that reconciliation of faith and knowledge which may be termed Christian philosophy, as the nearest equivalent to its (what's?) language in our own day." Now, the Lord's declaration is, "If ye continue in my word, ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." This means, after doubt and perplexity, that reconciliation of faith and knowledge which may be termed Christian philosophy; that is, not continuing in Christ's word, but adding modern science, and so getting free. Again, in the passage referred to, the Apostle Paul declares of the wisdom in question, "yet not the wisdom of this world, nor of the princes of this world, that come to nought; but we speak the wisdom of God in a mystery, even the hidden wisdom which God ordained before the world for our glory;" that means geology, modern German criticism, and Bunsen's wild Hegelianism. The Apostle describes it thus: "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things that God hath prepared for them that love Him, but God hath revealed them to us by His Spirit;" and then the Apostle proceeds to show how he taught them. That means now, the removing doubt and inquiry, and the reconciliation of faith and knowledge, termed Christian philosophy.

W. But this is really puerile, as an interpretation of Scripture; they cannot have read the passages.

H. Just puerile; but they had the texts running in their minds, and it is what we find everywhere, letting their own minds reason without research. But I don't exactly know where we have got to here, save, happily, nearly to the end of the Essay. Our master taught us, at the beginning of it, there could be but one meaning to a passage of Scripture. Now, though it is inadmissible to accept the Apostles' use, because that gives the ideas of their age, passages are become so expansive, so Indian-rubber like, that, "we have" now "only to enlarge the meaning of Scripture, to apply it even to the novelties and peculiarities of our own times;" "and we cannot suppose,"—I almost regret quoting it from its want of reverence,—"that our Saviour, were He to come again upon earth, would refuse thus to extend them." And further, the only meaning was that which would have presented itself to the minds of those who first heard it. Here it is not likely that their words would have conveyed to the minds of the Jews who heard Him any notion of the perplexities, &c. ; but "it is not unfair" to apply it now to Jowett's interpretation and modern knowledge, termed Christian philosophy.

W. I suppose it is to give a full illustration of what I read in p. 372: "If words have more than one meaning, they may have any meaning. Instead of being a rule of life and faith, Scripture becomes the expression of the ever-changing aspect of religions. The unchangeable Word of God, in the name of which we repose, is changed by each age and each generation, in accordance with its passing fancy. The book in which we believe all religious truth to be contained, is the most uncertain of all books, because interpreted by arbitrary and uncertain methods." It is a singular description for a man to give of himself; but, I suppose, it is like Mahomet. His religion forbade any good Mussulman to have more than four wives, but, as he was the prophet of it, he took eighteen. It is a singular exhibition of the human mind, and of the pretensions and carelessness of these rationalists.

H. Well, dear W., we are happily drawing to a close, and though having had to wade through tedious details, the system is pretty well judged, I think; at any rate, it is for me, and the pretensions too.

W. They have not a feather's weight in my mind, and their weakness only makes the Divine Word stand out in its simple strength.

H. A few more observations, and I have done. We have looked at most of the observations which remain. I will just notice distinctly one or two.

"The original meaning of Scripture is beginning to be clearly understood. But the apprehension of the original meaning is inconsistent with the reception of a typical or conventional one." I have gone through the cases alleged to prove this. A conventional one, I give him up; but that a typical one is not to be received is simple folly, when half the book is typical, both as to ordinances and facts; and the whole New Testament and Christianity in its foundation based upon its being so. The man who asserts it must be out of his senses, or deny Christianity and the Lord's whole history and place in it; and he refers expressly to these types. "We shall find it impossible to maintain it partially, e. g., in the types of the Mosaic law." Now, I say, either this or all Scripture is simple nonsense; for Christ is the Lamb of God, our Passover, and it is impossible that the blood of bulls and of goats could take away sin. But there is an object, a bent of purpose in all this, which I would notice; perhaps, I should rather say an effect than an object, for I would not exaggerate, but which is certainly Satan's object. It is this. Having no truth at all, they are indifferent to it, and like to be free; and, having nothing which they value as truth, they are content to leave others free too. It looks liberal, but is really caring for nothing as the truth. This you may have seen in their interpretation of the remarkable passage of the blessed Lord, "If ye continue in my word, ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall make you free." An immense announcement of the love of God giving the promise of deliverance by certain known truth, and, it is added, by the Son, from all immoral influences, all that was not the truth. This for them means now doubt and inquiry, and a mixture of philosophy and knowledge with faith, that is, with Christ's Word, which is the truth. Hence, as they have liberty for themselves, they must have it for others, that is, indifference. Hence, they say, a change is observable in the manner in which doctrines are stated and defended; it is no longer held sufficient to rest them on texts of Scripture, one, two, or more, which contain or appear to contain similar words or ideas. That is, this Divine standard of truth, "the inspired source of truth," to use their own words, has lost its authority. "They are connected more closely with our moral nature," i. e., we judge for ourselves of their truth and fitness—"extreme consequences are shunned, large allowances are made for the ignorance of mankind." 'They are wise, they suffer fools gladly.' "It is held there is truth on both sides; about many questions there is a kind of union of opposites." So "is it a mere chimera, that the different questions of Christendom may meet on the common ground of the New Testament?" each believing what he likes, of course, and meeting in — — what? A kind of union of opposites. They will agree in receiving the New Testament; but, like inspiration, "it is one of those theological terms which may be regarded as great peacemakers, but which are also sources of distrust and misunderstanding. For, while we are ready to shake hands with any one who uses the same language as ourselves, a doubt is apt to insinuate itself whether he takes the language in the same sense," p. 344. It is a kind of hope, or advice, which, he told us there, came from a bad quarter. "It is placed by Goëthe in the mouth of Mephistopheles. Pascal severely charges the Jesuits with acting in a similar manner." "But this is not the way to heal the wounds of the Church of Christ." To be sure it is not, but it serves for something else, to make men indifferent as to the truth. It is one of the great questions of the day, Is the unity of Christians to be founded on what Scripture speaks of—Love for the truth's sake, or indifference to it? And mark the fruit of it here: "Examples of this sturdy orthodoxy in our own generation rather provoke a smile than any serious disapproval." Again, "But that (the uselessness of a formal scheme of union) is no reason for doubting that the divisions of the Christian world are beginning to pass away. The progress of politics, acquaintance with other countries, the growth of knowledge and material greatness, changes of opinion in the Church of England, the present position of the Roman communion; all these phenomena show that the ecclesiastical state of the world is not destined to be perpetual." Again, "The recognition of the fact, that many aspects and stages in religion are found in Scripture; that different, or even opposite parties existed in the Apostolic Church; that the first teachers of Christianity had a separate and individual mode of regarding the Gospel of Christ; that any existing communion is necessarily much more unlike the brotherhood of love in the New Testament than we are willing to suppose—Protestants, in some respects, as much as Catholics—that rival sects in our own day—Calvinists and Arminians—those who maintain and those who deny the final restoration of man—may equally find texts which seem to favour their respective tenets (Mark ix. 44—48; Rom. xi. 32)—the recognition of these and similar facts will make us unwilling to impose any narrow rule of religious opinion on the ever varying conditions of the human mind and Christian society.” Now, the incontrovertible departure from early devotedness and brotherly love, if we take the display of it in the Church as a whole as a standard, the New Testament has prophetically and even historically made known to us, assuring us that, in the last days, perilous times should come. That the Holy Ghost employed Peter and Paul, and John, and even James and Jude, and, indeed, the Gospels themselves, to give us different aspects of Christ and Christianity, that we who know in part, might have a complete and perfect apprehension of both, is full of the deepest interest to the intelligent study of Scripture. Of the extreme ignorance of Scripture interpretation shown in the quotation of Rom. xi. 32, I say nothing. I notice purely the result of all that Mr. Jowett has observed, the effect of modern thinking and searching. It is simply to arrive at Pilate’s question, with the Truth, the eternal Son of God, before Him—What is truth? And when he had said this, he went out, and, though he found no fault in Him, it all ended in, “not this man but Barabbas.” If we turn to Christian missions, the truth is equally given up. “You may take the purer light or element of religion, of which Christianity is the expression, and make it shine on some principle in human nature, which is the fallen image of it. You cannot give a people, who have no history of their own, a sense of the importance of Christianity as an historical fact.” The fact of the incarnation of the eternal Son of God coming into the world, is to be dropped. "We want to awaken in them the sense that God is their Father, and they His children; and that is of more importance than anything about the inspiration of Scripture. But to teach in this spirit, the missionary should himself be able to separate the accidents from the essence of religion; he should be conscious that the power of the Gospel resides, not in the particulars of theology, but in the Christian life." So it was all a mistake to say the truth shall make you free.

Now, you will remark, all this is an effort to make truth immaterial. I am no stickler for conventional or traditional denominations, and, if anything is far from my thoughts, it is that the miserable things called denominations are one or another of them the υπος of the πληρωμα of salvation. Mr. Jowett might take me rather, I suppose, for an achamoth in the world composed of my sighs and tears, &c., for the state of things. But what I remark is, that having neither Christ nor allegiance to Him, nor the truth—and He is the truth—mentioned, nor thought of, "the progress of politics, changes of opinion in the establishment," are the real agents in dissolving "the Christian world." Now, I do not dispute this. But, for him, therefore, as "opposite parties existed in the apostolic Church," Protestants are no better than Roman Catholics; Calvinists, and Arminians, holders of eternal punishments and deniers of it, may equally find texts which seem to favour their respective tenets, truth is all a fancy, and no one "will impose any narrow rule of religious opinion on the ever varying rule of the human mind and Christian society." Now, that this is going on, no one with his eyes open can deny. But a more absolute negation of truth, indifference to it, or rather unconsciousness that there is a Christ in Christianity, or truth in Scripture, or anywhere else, it is impossible to believe. It is not, indeed, astonishing in one who holds that the use of Scripture in the New Testament, sanctioned by our Lord and the Apostles, is in, probably, no instance based on the original sense or context, and liable to error and perversion ; so that, as to them it is true, that, "if we are permitted to apply Scripture under the pretence of interpreting it, the language of Scripture becomes only a mode of expressing the public feeling or opinion of our own day ;" so that what Christ and the Apostles taught is only such a public opinion of their day, for they, Mr. Jowett declares, did so apply Scripture ; yet declaring that "we have only to enlarge the meaning of Scripture to apply it to the novelties and peculiarities of our own times," and that our Saviour would not refuse, if He were to come again now, thus to extend them, and that it is not unfair to use St. Paul's statements thus, and sanction the views of our day,—it is not astonishing, I say, that one who blames the Lord and His Apostles, so as to make their use of Scripture no kind of guide to its meaning or purpose, but assumes full right to get at the truth by giving his own application, and to get freedom promised by Christ through it, that he should put Christ and all truth out of sight in a Christian world, look to politics governing it, and take indifference and no truth as his standard and his hope. But it is all a delusion. Those who buy the truth and sell it not will hold to it, and take Christ's word as the revelation and standard of it for their hearts, owning the Apostles as ministers of it by the Spirit. Many will take refuge in it, too, from sorrow, and passion's rage on the other side, when the dissolution looked for takes place. But the present working will be this : the philosophical indifference of rationalists will palsy sturdy Protestant orthodoxy, which till now held its ground against Popery. Popery, which does not rest on truth a bit more, but on authority, and in its nature is essentially infidel, does know what it wants and what it wills, and will pursue it constantly, cleverly, and energetically, and all hold of truth will be gone in the country. This state of things the Dissenters will help on, and then find how weak they are. The main effect of this rationalism will be giving power for a time to what knows its own mind, that is, to Popery. The rationalism itself has no future at all. Of what would it be the future? Of inquiring and waiting till the Pope and infidels take the New Testament for a common ground? They can destroy, perhaps, faith in the truth (where it is not in the heart), but produce nothing.

W. You are somewhat a sombre prophet, though I see the truth of what you say in principle.

H. No; I believe the word of God abides for ever. I believe Christ, our blessed Lord, has all power in heaven and in earth; and for the soul who loves the truth, I believe it is a very bright and blessed time. I admit that what old associations may attach men to, is disappearing. Every one sees it, though how much we have to thank God that in this country it is peacefully; though I doubt that Christian or religious liberty will last very long as it is now, the revival will help to destroy it: but as outward props tumble and disappear, for those who have Christ in their hearts, and to whom the truth is precious, He will be more and more all, and the truth have infinitely more power and price. They will live more in Christianity, and less in the Christian world formed by phases of the αιωνος τουτου. I feel thoroughly that they are times most simple for those who love the truth, and blessed ones; soon I trust to be replaced by heavenly and better ones still. Only Christ and the truth must be of course all.

H. Of course it does. Did you ever find the Lord propose our being happy without it? Can anything live above sight and sense, and its influences, but faith? No doubt we are all imperfect in this heavenly temperament that associates us livingly with what is Divine and unseen; and therefore in being separated from earth in spirit, we may have trials and discipline where the flesh clings; even, it may be, what the Lord calls cutting off a right hand or plucking out a right eye. But for faith, I read, "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer, I have overcome the world." It is a remarkable thing that the two things which the Lord refers to as setting us free, are both of them wholly out of sight, unmentioned, and unthought of by Mr. Jowett: "The truth shall make you free, and the Son shall make you free;" though he quotes this passage to make Christian philosophy of it. But they do make us free, much as we may have to seek to know their power better. But it is a touchstone of their whole system, the total leaving out of the two things which the Lord Himself says make us free. But it could not be otherwise. Their system is doubt and inquiry. Love of truth they call it; but never the truth loved or known. I think we have pretty thoroughly gone through the system. The narrower fields of tendencies of religious thought in England and national churches, which they say the heathen had too, such is their exclusion of Christ and the truth, I do not feel there is much need that we should enter upon. I would only remark how singular the darkness as to the power of Christianity was a century or more ago, and thereby note the limit of proofs of Christianity. Butler's "Analogy," a standard book known to all, and not only first rate for its age, but, to use the new word of the Germanizers, on its stand-point incomparable, when the author shows negatively the folly of those who, believing in a God of nature, would question revealed religion—breaks down in the most singular manner when he enters on positive Christian ground. He shows that deists have no proof of anything; but he does venture a little on to positive ground. He reasons, however, from Aristotelian to Christian principles. For happiness we must have virtue, for virtue victory and a formed habit. Then he says that this supposes that these propensions (lusts) must exist in heaven; "and for my part," he adds, "I do not see how it could be otherwise."

W. Is it possible?

H. It is a fact. It only shows what a different thing faith and the proof of Christianity are. A child that had faith, in any age since Adam, to say nothing of a Christian, would have rejected such a thought. But what?—except the kingdom of God be received as a little child, we shall in no case enter therein. But you and I, through grace—and, thank God, thousands more—have been given to believe in the truth, to know the Lord, and, feeble as it may be in us, to love Christ. May His grace keep us steadfast in faith, and in its fruits. The question for a soul now is Christ, that blessed Person who reveals the Father. The truth of a living, acting Spirit, the Comforter, given; and the revealed written Word of God, the only source and the standard of truth; and that that which we are called on to confess is the truth, known by the Spirit from that Word, known in the heart with God; and, while acknowledging we may be mistaken in a hundred points, knowing that we have the truth for which martyrs have died, and that we had rather give up our lives than lose, or deny it. The Lord Jesus is at the right hand of God the Father. He may suffer us to be tried, but He is above all, and will prevail; watches over us always as the good Shepherd, and will, in the Father's own time, come and receive us to Himself, that where He is we may be also.

W. I do heartily believe it, and thank God it is so; but I am sure Christians in these days ought to give a more distinct witness to whom they belong—I mean practically, as devoted to Him—by their profession, and the fruits which make it good. “Show us thy faith,” has all its force now.

H. In truth it has. If I contend for the truth, because Christ is the truth, I had rather one did not profess it, than deny it in works. We are in serious, most serious times, and there must be reality. Only the Lord keep us from pretended love of the truth, which destroys the truth we love; which has nothing to keep, and hence has nothing to lose, and can be always seeking. When conventional systems are crumbling around, and evil raises up its head, may men be seen who can walk peacefully, because they possess what can never crumble till God makes all things new according to the truth He has revealed.

W. I am glad we met; it has done me good. Holding fast the truth, and feeling one has it (oh, what grace it is!) from God, always does. We may now turn to seek directly, and with humble thankfulness, into the treasure we have in the truth—the unsearchable riches of Christ, which is made over to us. It is yet happier work.

H. Adieu, then, for the present; may we be only found at our watch-tower, and, above all, humble and dependent. I have not, after all, gone into the article in the Edinburgh. It is merely an attempt to justify infidelity, because it has prevailed for many years in Germany, so that even evangelical professors yield more or less to it; and an attempt to defend the Essayists, by proving the superior clergy to be as bad; and I don't really see how this affects the truth or falsehood of the principles themselves. I think many non-infidel professors in Germany have yielded, through want of faith, to the current; and I see the same tone prevalent in the clergy and dissenting ministers in England. They like the credit of being up to the progress of the age. And there is so very little faith in the intrinsic truth and power of Scripture, in its being the Word of God, that their estimate and defence of it necessarily fails on that side. The clergy must answer for themselves to the charges of the reviewer. They ought to be morally indignant at the article. But I do not see, if he proves the assailants of the Essayists dishonest, and to have been previously abettors of their views, what an upright mind will have gained, or lost. It does not affect the question in the smallest degree, but merely the reputation of the clergy. I do not think much of an opponent who, when his friend is charged with being dishonest, declares he will prove the accuser as bad. The whole matter savours of want of principle and personality. Besides, many a mind may be led away from solid ground by new thoughts, which, when their ripe fruit is shown, honestly discards them all. I think this Review a very poor thing; lowering eternal questions to personal ones, and not worthy, therefore, of any particular notice.

It is impossible to treat the author of this book as a Christian. I do not say this as forming any judgment of his personal state, in any way ; I speak of the public profession of a religion he belongs to—Christianity as contrasted with heathenism, Mohammedanism, Judaism, or Buddhism. Dr. Colenso states that “ our belief in the living God remains as sure as ever, though not the Pentateuch only, but the whole Bible were removed. It is written on our hearts by God’s own finger as surely as by the hand of the apostle in the Bible, that ‘ God is, and is a rewarder of them that diligently seek Him.’ It is written there also as plainly as in the Bible, that ‘ God is not mocked,—that whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap,’ and that ‘ he that soweth to the flesh shall of the flesh reap corruption,’” pp. 53, 54. That is, with the Bible or without the Bible, Dr. C. believes in the existence of God, and His rewarding them that seek Him, and in natural conscience. In other words (as far as his book goes, which he puts forth as a manifesto), he is a professed Deist. Even with the Bible he only believes so much as his heart and conscience recognise, and that the latter is to be preferred to the Bible as the means of knowing God : “ that He Himself, the living God, our Father and Friend, is nearer and closer to us than any book can be ; that His voice within the heart may be heard continually by the obedient child that listens for it, and that shall be our teacher and guide in the path of duty, which is the path of life, when all other helpers—even the words of the best of books—may fail us,” p. 54. Now it is clear that neither believing that God is, nor natural conscience, is believing in the special facts of Christianity—the incarnation, atonement, correction, redemption, being born again, the exaltation of man to God’s right hand, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost. In a word, no special truth or fact of Christianity is "written on our hearts by God's own finger," or can be possessed by mere natural conscience or belief in God. All intervention of God is left out. But it is in this, and the statement of what led to its necessity, that revealed religion consists. There is a conscience in every man. The word of God acts on it. I do not doubt that there is an instinctive knowledge of a God and a judgment. This is all Dr. C. owns, with or without the Bible. Revealed religion is a series of divine and marvellous facts and truths, unfolding an intervention of God in grace with sinful man. He sets this aside. His relationship with God is not founded on it. He prefers, as teaching, what he has without it; that is, he wholly and professedly sets aside Christianity. He goes farther—he recognizes "the voice of God's Spirit . . . not in the Bible only, but out of the Bible: not to us Christians only, but to our fellow-men of all climes and countries, ages and religions, the same gracious Teacher is revealing, in different measures, according to His own good pleasure, the hidden things of God," p. 222. Dr. C. has, in substance, solemnly declared that this is not so (see Article xviii. of the Thirty-nine Articles); but I suppose this is no matter with rationalists. But his statement amounts to this: Christians and heathens have all their particular religions, but beside and within this, all have a communication in their own hearts of the hidden things of God. The knowledge of God is not in the religion, for heathens and Christians have it more or less, whatever their religion, in their hearts. He confirms this by quotations from Cicero, Sikhs, and Hindoos. Cicero's statement—I suppose Dr. C. did not find it out—is merely asserting natural conscience, with the addition of a denial of the foundation fact of revelation, that man is a sinner, driven out from God. "Whoever will not obey this law," says Cicero, "will be flying from himself, and having treated with contempt his human nature will, in that very fact, pay the greatest penalty, even if he shall have escaped other punishments, as they are commonly considered." Now this makes human nature the measure of good, as indeed Cicero everywhere does. And just see the result, which neither Dr. C. nor Lactantius, from whom he quotes, seem to have noticed: this law or right reason "to the good never commands or forbids in vain, never influences the wicked either by commanding or forbidding." Could grace be more fully denied? Could the effect of law or conscience be more entirely misstated? There are good or wicked already—God knows how—and this law or right reason changes nothing,—always succeeds with one, and leaves the other where he is. This is, we are told, “a voice almost divine.” “The same divine Teacher revealed also to the Sikh Goroos (teachers) such great truths as these,” p. 223. He then quotes statements of the unity of God, but which is Pantheism, that is, that God is in every thing; statements which recognize Mahomets, Brahmas, Vishnus, Sivas—of course not Christ—and that is a revelation of God for Dr. C. He then quotes from Hindoo writings “the following words, which were written by one who had no Pentateuch nor Bible to teach him, but who surely learned such living truths as these by the direct teaching of the Spirit of God,” p. 224. In these words God is celebrated, and there is a good deal of moralizing, such as may be found anywhere; but in which we find, “He that partaketh of but one grain of the love of God shall be released from the sinfulness of all his doubts and actions”—a comfortable quietus. “I take for my spiritual food the water and the leaf of Ram.” “God dwelleth in the mind, and none other but God.” Dr. C. admires what is the avowed doctrine of these same teachers, without finding out it is the grossest folly of Pantheism. “God is the gift of charity, God is the offering, God is the fire of the altar, by God the sacrifice is performed, and God is to be obtained by him who makes God alone the object of his work.” Everything being but a development or expansion of God, we are too, and, of course, so far as we realize God in it, become God in a superior degree. But all is God; and it is true of all things, man among the rest. This last sentence, as Dr. C. approvingly quotes, was by “one who had experienced somewhat of what Job had experienced,” p. 223. All this is but extracting Deism from Christianity and heathenism alike, and making conscience the judge of what is to be received from each; only, unfortunately, Dr. C.’s conscience accepts the very grossest Pantheism without so much as finding it out.

But there is more than this. This book does not believe as much of Christ as Mohammed did. Dr. C. openly professes to know much better than Christ upon the subject of the divine authority of revelation. Mohammed held Christ to be a prophet, and that he will judge the world. On the last point the book does not declare itself, if it be not in an intimation borrowed from Cicero. Here is Dr. C.’s estimate of Christ’s authority in what he declared: “We are expressly told, in Luke ii. 52, that Jesus increased in wisdom as well as in stature. It is not supposed that in His human nature He was acquainted, more than any educated Jew of the age, with the mysteries of all modern sciences, nor, with St. Luke's expressions before us, can it be seriously maintained that, as an infant or young child He possessed a knowledge surpassing that of the most pious and learned adults of His nation, upon the subject of the authority and age of the different portions of the Pentateuch. At what period, then, of His life upon earth, is it to be supposed that He had granted to Him, as the Son of Man, super-naturally, full and accurate information on these points, so that He should be expected to speak about the Pentateuch in other terms than any other devout Jew of that day would have employed? Why should it be thought that He would speak with certain divine knowledge on this matter more than upon other matters of ordinary science or history?" p. 32. That is, when Christ, the Blessed One, spoke of the authority of the Word of God,—spoke authoritatively of the Scriptures and of Moses,—He merely followed the ignorance and prejudice of the pious Rabbis of his nation. Dr. Colenso has more knowledge, and is freed from the prejudices, and in consequence can tell us positively that Christ was wrong! He has found out that it is impossible that such things as are found in the Pentateuch could come from our loving Father. This, if we are to believe Dr. C., Christ had not moral discernment enough to find out, and took for granted all was right, so as to believe that what Moses wrote came from God. Now Christ says, "We speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen," for He was of and in heaven; and the question is not how He learned what He knew, but, when he taught positively, did He teach perfectly, or only under the influence of national prejudice? Dr. C. quotes the following passages of Christ's words:—"Had ye believed Moses ye would have believed me, for he wrote of me; but if ye believe not his writings, how shall ye believe my words?" But it seems this appeal was all beside the mark, for Moses never wrote it at all. Hence, of course, they were not called upon to believe Christ's words either. "Now that the dead are raised, even Moses shewed at the bush." This too was quite a mistake. "They have Moses and the prophets, let them hear them. If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." But all this solemn appeal of Christ to Moses, as of equal authority and weight with His own words and resurrection, as a proof of truth, is a mistake, the prejudice of pious Rabbis of His nation! Dr. C. is freed from them, and can prove he knows much better than Christ did. And this man is what is called "Bishop of Natal." I may be asked, has he not declared his belief in all the canonical Scriptures, and bound himself in this office to require it of those he ordains? He has. What then does he do with his conscience? He tells us that too: it is governed by the Court of Arches. It is a mercy for upright men that modern rationalists shew themselves so plainly morally. I do not think I ever read anything so morally base as the reasons for signing the Articles, in the "Essays and Reviews." Old infidels broke with Christianity—it was sad enough—but modern ones keep their places and only give up their faith.

The boldness of Dr. C.'s assertions, and the excessive carelessness of his statements and conclusions, are alike remarkable. He tells us that he does not believe in the deluge, because he does in geology. He has studied it in the Zulu country, and he now knows for certain (for Sir C. Lyell is infallible, if Scripture and the Lord Christ be not) that a universal deluge could not possibly have taken place. Now Sir C. Lyell is unquestionably an able geologist, as well as the constant resort and refuge of infidels; but he has a system, and a system which geologists less speculative and, at the very least, as able as he, entirely reject. Nor does he deny that the science is in its infancy. The ablest inquirers believe in a universal deluge; the latest researches tend to prove it. I say tend, because no certain conclusions can yet be made from geology as to dates. I do not hesitate to affirm, and I am supported by the ablest geologists, that geological dates and periods stand on the most uncertain and unsatisfactory footing. Sir C. Lyell's system is utterly unsatisfactory,—irreconcilable with the evident facts of the upheaval theory, which is generally admitted. Dr. C. assures us that a partial deluge is no better, so that in spite of universal tradition, Scripture, and the authority of Christ, who refers specifically to the deluge as true (Matt. xxiv. 37—39), and much geological research, we are to have no deluge at all. I do not know that I should ever have noticed this point, as it is impossible to follow it out here, but as affording a proof of Dr. C.'s manner of reasoning. It was not partial, he says, because a flood which should cover Ararat must, in due time, sweep over the Puy de Dôme, because water finds its own level!—that is to say, water 16,000 or 17,000 feet deep in a narrow locality, must have been some 5,000 feet deep at thousands of miles' distance, when it had spread that distance in every direction! And a man who reasons thus is to call in question the accuracy of Scripture. But Dr. Colenso assures us the Scriptures never affirm their own infallibility. Abstractedly "infallibility" belongs to a person, not to what has been already said; but they affirm that they are inspired by God, and that they have His authority. The Lord says, "The Scripture cannot be broken"—appeals to it, as we have seen, as of equal authority with His own words—refers to them as testifying of Him—expounds them after His resurrection in what they taught concerning Himself—declares that all they said must be fulfilled—opens His disciples' understanding to understand them—declares that His rising from the dead would be useless to convince those by whom they were not believed;—they are quoted by Him as absolutely conclusive authority. Facts here questioned, or borne with because they may be "fairly disposed of," are referred to by Christ as undoubted history. So the apostles write whole epistles, in which their entire teaching is based upon the truth and inspired authority of Scripture. Paul speaks of the Scriptures "foreseeing," so completely does he identify them with God. "But what saith the Scripture?" is conclusive: not only so—they declare them to be by inspiration. They are called the oracles of God, and the possession of them is counted to be the main privilege of God's people; so the law is called "the living oracles." Peter says, "No prophecy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost." I dare say Dr. C. will call the authenticity of this in question. Take, then, the first Epistle (though I am perfectly satisfied of the authenticity of the second). There he states that the prophets searched as men into their own prophecies, as given by the Spirit of Christ which was in them. Paul declares that "Every Scripture is given by inspiration of God"—the security of the saint in the last perilous times. He calls the Scriptures "prophetic Scriptures" (Scriptures of the prophets). I have no doubt this refers to the New Testament, but if it be the Old, it is saying they are inspired. So his own teaching he declares to be by "words which the Holy Ghost teacheth." The prophets were infamous impostors, if what they said were not the direct testimony of God himself, for they say, "Thus saith the Lord." As to Christ, it is said, "He whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God, for God giveth not the Spirit by measure unto Him." Thus, as Son of man, what He spoke He spoke—to refer to Dr. C.'s question—"supernaturally," and his words were the words of God. I am aware that Dr. C. says that, on such subjects, He was no wiser than other pious Jews, and that he thinks himself wiser than Christ and the apostles on such ; but does he expect everyone to have the same opinion of him that he has of himself? Does he think that many even will respect the judgment of one called a Bishop, who persuades us that Christ was prejudiced and he is not? Poor human nature !

Allow me to ask you, Dr. Colenso, do you believe in the resurrection? do you believe in this stupendous exercise of Divine power, so suited to man subject to death? I mean the resurrection of Him who was "delivered for our offences and raised again for our justification." Is it not something, this coming in of God to take out of death and from among the dead His own Son, given for our sins? Do you find this without a revelation? Does Cicero furnish you with this, or do Sikh Goo-roos, or Pantheistic Brahmins? They may say fine things about God and patience, and do the same things (as Paul says) as the rest: can they tell of the deliverance of sinful man? I can conceive no greater proof of imbecility and wilful ignorance of facts than to compare the revelation first of the whole history of man, under God's dealings with his responsibility, and then of atonement and the intervention of God in deliverance, with the fine sayings of some heathen;—one who shows, too, men to be incapable of knowing God, as Cicero does, or with the moralizing of Pantheists.

But I close. I am not writing a book on these things, but penning an ephemeral article on the poorest piece of infidelity I ever met with, and I turn to the objections to run them over rapidly. Let my reader only remember this. The object of Scripture is not to meet objections or give history, but, on the part of God, what is divinely instructive to man; that, if the Old Testament gave the perfection of the New,—it would prove it was not true, for the true light did not shine till Christ came; that, meeting objections does not give the force of the positive proofs. It seems candid to quote Kurtz and Hengstenberg (men who, however respectable, know little, as I judge, of the power of Scripture), but in merely giving answers to objections all the positive proofs are, of course, left out. If no answer could be given to an objection, and yet there were positive proof of that against which the objection was brought, this would only prove the solution of the difficulty was not known. The positive proofs of the truth of Scripture are such, that the denial of their being, as they are called, "the oracles of God" is an evidence only of the moral darkness of the rejector of them. It is quite true

I cannot explain light to a blind man; but every one who sees knows he is blind. Above all, let my reader remember that the Lord himself treats the Scriptures as absolutely inspired and authoritative, quotes them as we now have them, and declares that all written of Him must be fulfilled,—that “not a jot or tittle can pass from the law till all be fulfilled,” the law which Dr. C. pronounces he could not attribute to God, save as he selects bits according to his own fancy, for he has, of course, a perfect judgment;—a man who sees nothing in the minutiae of the law, which (while a yoke in the letter) as a shadow of good things to come, is full of the deepest instruction: let him remember that Dr. C. presents himself as wiser and better informed than Christ, and if he have faith to do it, pray for one who can think so, and publish a book to tell the world he does.

Such views, they tell us, will unite all pious people in one mother church; and if such questions should disturb men’s minds, and a serious person would ponder and weigh them before doing so, he has only to remember that Dr. C. has such a sense of the petty importance of his own position, that he cannot have leisure (so he tells us) to ponder a while before he gives forth, pretending to be wiser than Christ,—opinions which contradict what Christ says.

The first objection is that in Genesis xlvi., Hezron and Hamul are stated to have gone down to Egypt, and consequently to have been born in Canaan, but that it is impossible if the ages of Judah and Joseph be considered. It is contended that Judah was forty-two when Jacob went down into Egypt, inasmuch as Joseph was thirty-nine. Genesis xxx. 24—26, and xxxi. 41, are cited to prove that Joseph was born in the seventh, Judah in the fourth year “of Jacob’s double marriage.” The impossibility of Hezron and Hamul’s going down to Egypt, arises from this, that Judah was twenty when Joseph went down into Egypt, and that Hezron and Hamul, who rank in point of time with Judah’s great grand-children, though his own grand-children by Tamar, could not have been born when he was forty-two, i.e. twenty-two years afterwards. On the other hand, it is insisted that the narrative of Jacob’s going down, makes sixty-six souls go with him, and there are not sixty-six without Hezron and Hamul.

There is no ground for the objection at all. I do not insist on the uncertainty of the exact difference between the ages of Judah and Joseph, as what might be added, even if just, would hardly clear up the point; though, bringing it perhaps within the limits of possibility, it is sufficient to throw doubt upon Dr. C.'s assertions. But Gen. xlv. is simply to record the immediate descendants of Jacob who were associated with himself in Egypt, to give his family. Thus Er and Onan are noticed, only it is added, they died in Canaan. It is then added "and the sons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul." This 12th verse is distinctly genealogy, not that all went down into Egypt who are named in it: for Er and Onan are named because they are sons, while it is expressly stated they did not go down at all.*

In the 12th verse, the introduction of "were" is emphatic, and the phrase, I apprehend, clearly intended to be supplementary. It is not "Er, and Onan, and Shelah, and Pharez, and Zarah, and the sons of Pharez, Hezron, and Hamul," which would clearly have been the case if they had been goes down into Egypt. But the historian stops at Zarah, and adds supplementary information: Er and Onan were on the list of sons, but they did not go down—they died before, and Pharez's sons were Hezron and Hamul. They are looked at as filling up the breach, but the latter half of the verse is, in contrast with going down, an explanation of the history of that family. As if he had said: these were Judah's sons, but I must add this explanation to the statement: Er and Onan never got down, for they died, and Pharez had two sons who are counted in to supply their place. For, though the leading thought be the going down into Egypt, yet in order to this he gives the whole family; and that this is so is evident, for he introduces Joseph's sons, adding they were born in Egypt. Indeed, I think it very questionable whether all Benjamin's sons were born when he came into Egypt. It was after Joseph's birth that Jacob agreed with Laban to stay longer, and staid six years. He then journeyed to Palestine, when Joseph must have been seven years old. He was sold into Egypt at seventeen. Hence Jacob had been only ten years in Canaan when Joseph went there. Jacob had settled first at Succoth, then near Shechem, and Dinah, who was probably * The computation in the passage is not very clear. If we count in Er and Onan, we have thirty-three sons and grandsons. If we leave them out we must count Jacob among the souls of his own sons and daughters. However, I am disposed to include Dinah and Jacob, and leave out Er and Onan, and read thus:—"These be the sons of Leah which she bare unto Jacob in Padan Aram, with his daughter Dinah, all the souls of his sons and daughters: thirty and three." As if he had said, this makes thirty and three. If not, we must count in Er and Onan, and make it mere genealogical computation of sons, and the 26th verse would be general, the computation already given excluding Jacob, and Joseph and his sons.

nearly of Joseph's age, was old enough to be ill-treated by Hamor, before Benjamin was born. For Jacob went off to Bethel after the destruction of the men of Shechem, and after leaving Bethel, Benjamin was born, and Rachel died. He does not appear either in the history. Joseph is a boy, the son of Jacob's old age. Benjamin could only have been two or three years old when Joseph went down; for if Dinah were seven or eight years old when she came to Canaan, say she was fifteen or sixteen when Hamor wronged her; seven or eight years had elapsed in Canaan before Benjamin was born, and two or three years more elapsed before Joseph went down. We must add twenty-two for the interval between Joseph's and Jacob's going down. Benjamin was thus at the utmost twenty-four or twenty-five. So he is called a "lad" (nahar) xliii. 3, and a little one (katan) in xliv. 20, and (nahar) again, 31. This being so, and giving the fullest possible age of twenty-five, which, with the three terms, is very improbable, it is very little likely that he had ten sons born to him. I doubt even whether Reuben's sons were all born, as he says, "slay my two sons." On the whole, I think it is evident that this is a genealogical list, without reference to the place of birth: the statement of the whole family, as a family, who went down. This manner of giving a genealogy complete, and a general fact which is not accurately true as to each individual in it, though it characterizes the subject of recital, we have other examples of. To go no further than chapter xxxv. : All Jacob's sons are given, including Benjamin, immediately after the account of Benjamin's birth in Canaan, and it is added, "these are the sons of Jacob which were born to him in Padan Aram." The exact genealogy was the important thing, and it is given accurately. The main fact which characterized the family was their birth away from the land of promise, in the country where Jacob served for a wife. It was no object to except Benjamin in the statement; it was to give the accurate history of his birth. I doubt not a moment he is a special type of Christ in connection with Israel: the son of his mother's affliction, but of his father's right hand. But it could be no mistake, for the writer or compiler, or whatever he was, had given all the details of his birth immediately before, and speaks in the passage itself of Jacob's being in that land. But, Benjamin being born, the time was come to give the whole family. The subjects are given with divine purpose, in view of after dealings of God, which He foreknew, not as mere histories to amuse; and hence we get distinct subjects without arrangement of dates. Dr. C. states that Judah's misconduct was after Joseph's going down to Egypt, because it is said, "at that time." Now Judah's genealogy and ways were all important because our Lord was to spring out of Judah. But after this history of Judah which lasts some twenty years at any rate, the history of Joseph's going down into Egypt is resumed where it left off. Judah's history is introduced as a separate subject parenthetically. The last verse of xxxvii., and the first verse of xxxix. are connected, and the history of Judah comes in between as a whole of twenty years by itself. "At that time" is only the general epoch, and the whole history is given together. This is exceedingly common in Scripture. But as Joseph was a remarkable type of Christ, so Judah was his progenitor according to the flesh. And this Pharez and his son Hezron were so. I must add that the relative ages of Judah and Joseph are anything but clearly proved. The relative dates of Joseph's birth and his going down into Egypt, and of each to other events are far more distinctly given.

On the whole the purpose of the statement in Gen. xlvii., is clearly to give Jacob's family, and hence some are noticed who did not go down to Egypt, and Hezron and Hamul are specially introduced into the verse not with the list of sons, but as associated with them. The saying, "Thy father went down into Egypt threescore and ten persons, and now ye are as the stars," takes up the general fact, to show the marvellous increase. The same is the case in the New Testament, specially in Luke.

Dr. C., in fact, admits the whole case where he says, "wishing to sum up the seventy souls under one category, he uses (inaccurately as he himself admits) the same expression, 'came into Egypt.'" Now this settles the whole question. He gives a category of persons, that category being Jacob's family, with the general fact of that family's leaving Canaan and going into Egypt. But he introduces some who did not literally go down, though they were there. If this be so, and it is perfectly evident, Dr. C.'s argument is simply worth nothing at all. When he says: "all the souls which came into Egypt were threescore and ten," we have the demonstration that some at least who were born in Egypt, provided they were of the family that came, are accounted as coming. The case of Hezron and Hamul is much clearer, because there is only an accessory statement in the genealogy; "and the sons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul." And we have no need to say again with Dr. C., "the description is, of course, literally incorrect, but the writer's meaning is obvious enough," for it is literally correct, and the meaning obvious too. But I may add Dr. C.'s own remark, which shews the utter wilfulness and equal absurdity of his objection: "He wishes to specify all those out of the sons of Jacob who were living at the time of the commencement of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, and from whom such a multitude had sprung at the time of the Exodus." How soon Hezron and Hamul were born we cannot say. They are brought into the list in connection with the loss of two of the sons of Judah, with whose history they were connected,—one of them being ancestor of David and of Christ.

The next objection is really almost too absurd to notice, but worthy the futility of rationalist arguments. Dr. C. makes a computation of how far files of men as many in number as could stand in front of the breadth of the tabernacle would reach. Does he think the writer did not know, as well as Dr. C., that all the congregation could not have stood in the court? But he was not so morally dull as to think of it. Supposing the riot-act read to a crowd of 100,000 persons, and I say, the riot-act was read to the multitude who stood before the magistrate, and I computed how far 100,000 men would reach, standing in a file directly before the magistrate, what would any one think of the sense of the person who made the remark? Or, are the crowd not responsible because they cannot hear it? Away with such childish trifling. But the fact is, there is no ground for the remark at all. "Before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation," has a most important meaning in these ordinances. Within the tabernacle and holiest of all was the place of Jehovah's communing directly with Moses; outside, yet in connection with the tabernacle, the place of meeting the people, of God's going out, not in the revelation of Himself, but in communications from Himself to the people, and of the access of the people to Him. All the court of the tabernacle of the congregation was held to have this character of "before the door of the tabernacle," and all done there and communicated thence was done before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. All brought up to the court was before the door. Thus if all the people had been outside the court and Moses had stood in the doorway of the court, they would have been before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation." It was the general expression for coming up to the court or entering it, though not going near the tabernacle where the door literally was. "The women," we read, "assembled themselves in troops at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation." They did not come when the tabernacle was set up in order, in troops, between the laver and the holy place. But we have the matter definitely stated.—In Exodus xl. we find, ver. 29, "he put the altar of the burnt offering by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. . . and he set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar." Thus the altar of burnt offering, the first thing met with on entering the court was by the door of the tabernacle. Now this was the place where God was to meet the children of Israel, as contrasted with meeting Moses within the veil. Exod. xxix. 42, "a continual burnt offering. . . at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord, where I will meet you to speak there unto thee. And there I will meet with the children of Israel." Thus Moses standing under the hangings of the court and speaking to the crowd without, was speaking to them gathered before the door of the tabernacle. Had they been inside the court he would have turned his back to them. So when a person offered a burnt offering, he offered it at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord.—He killed the bullock before the Lord, and the blood was sprinkled upon the altar that is before the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. They came up to the Lord there, instead of offering it where they pleased, away from him. And this was carefully secured by ordinance, as a guard against idolatry. They had to bring all the beasts they slew up before the Lord: Lev. xvii. 4. The gathering of the congregation to the door of the tabernacle was bringing them up to the court, so that Moses standing there might address them. And the place specifically pointed out for this was not at the door, but where the altar was, i. e. next the entrance of the court where the people were to come up with their sacrifices, and the Lord met with them.

Such objections as these are child's play, proving only entire ignorance of God's ways with Israel, and the purport of the ordinances, carelessness of research into them, with the pretension, the common accompaniment of ignorance, to see clearer than others, and the desire to make difficulties in presence of all the divine light which is found in what is objected to. Dr. C. seeks to prove his candour and care by showing that the elders of Israel were not all the congregation. He might have spared himself the trouble. And he has gone through sums of arithmetic to prove the size of the court. I really have not examined whether his multiplication is correct. I can suppose it.

His next objection is as to how Moses and Joshua addressed all Israel; and he wisely informs us that the crying of the children, whose mothers must be supposed to have pushed to the first place, would hinder all but those close by from hearing. Was ever anything more childish! Supposing all did not hear, which may very well be believed, they were all put under the responsibility of what was addressed to them, of which those who were in earnest could easily put themselves in possession. Supposing the elders or heads of tribes were nearest, as is probable, they would have both informed and led the others according to what was said.

The next objection is to the possibility, with so few priests, of having the bullock for a sin offering burned without the camp. Now I admit fully that the great object here is doctrinal, not historical. There is no history at all. What is ordained was only to be done in the case of the priests' or the whole congregation's sinning; ought never to have happened, and may never have happened. And from the way they went on (for they never circumcised their children, and certainly fell into idolatry) if the case did arise, they probably neglected the prescribed sacrifice. If it did happen once or twice, such a provision was no difficulty. That once or twice in forty years, or even in one year, such a toilsome ceremony should mark their sin was most appropriate. Nor do I doubt a moment that though the priest was responsible, and must have had and seen it done, the Levites or younger priests might share the manual toil. And this is implied in the form of the Hebrew verb which is the Hiphil, "to cause to go forth;" used no doubt consequently for "bringing forth," but which may be by another as by oneself, as it is used for causing an evil report to come on some one.*—For the rest, a walk of a mile and a half, or three miles, for their common bodily wants, was nothing out of the way for a people who had nothing to do except to tend their cattle, which would in itself have taken them there. To suppose they used fuel as in London is simple nonsense. And they chose * Yatsa is to go forth, and Bo is to go in or to. And hence the causative is used for bringing forth, because one who does cause to go or come forth. But there is no ground at all for confining it to the personal act of the person causing it to come forth. Thus, not only in the case of an evil report, Hotse Dibba, cited in the text. Deut. xvi. 23, Bringing forth the tithes. Lev. xxiv. 14, Bringing forth him that had cursed. Zech. iv. 7, Gen. xxxiv. 24, 25, Bringing forth Tamar. Ex. iii. 10, Moses is to bring forth Israel from Egypt; that is, cause them to come out. So Ex. xiv. 13, Heb. iv. So in Ezra i. 8. We have those did Cyrus bring forth by the hand of Mithredath. Where he expressly uses another to have them brought out. In a word, there is no ground at all for Dr. C.'s remarks.

places where wells were, and God clave the rock when there was no water. It is really absurd bringing forth such objections. Had Dr. C. been a soldier, or lived in the dirt I have had to live in, he would have known that a walk a mile and a half out of a city, for the necessities of life, was a very natural thing.

The fifth objection is first that the shekel is called the shekel of the sanctuary, before there was a sanctuary; and that the money of which the silver sockets, &c., were made was the redemption money, and that the census which ascertained the number of the people, on which the redemption money was paid, was six months afterwards, by which time the number must have increased. This has no foundation whatever. As to the remark that it was called the shekel of the sanctuary before the sanctuary was set up. The book is a history, and gives the sum taken according to the value of the money known when it was written. They paid at the time what was known, when the book was written, as the shekel of the sanctuary, perhaps settled at the very time. As regards the numbering, it is clear the computation of the sum that was paid is made from the numbering itself, the result of which was known when the account of it was written.—There is no continuing of the same number;—Exodus xxxviii. 26, Numb. i. 46;—it is the number itself. I do not know what the ground for saying six months is. The tabernacle was set up on the first day of the first month, the numbering took place a month after. The sockets, chapiters, and filaments may have been made just before. They may perfectly well have given each man his money, and the actual numbering been made six weeks afterwards to verify it, and that number be given as the ascertained one, even if some few had attained the age of twenty in the short interval. The command to give the half shekel is given in chapter xxx. But this was by no means all the silver, for many had offered willingly, but it was typically important that it should be understood that that on which the tabernacle of witness was founded was redemption, and what separated the service of God from the world was redemption. Hence the sockets of the boards of the tabernacle, and the hooks and chapiters on which the hangings of the court were fixed, were of this silver.—The actual numbering took place when the tabernacle was set up to verify the number redeemed, which had its own importance. If some shekels more were given it was of no consequence whatever to notice them, as the direction for their use was given already. Some few might have died who had given their half shekel, some few reached twenty, but the sum, when numbered, is taken as the sum applied to the service. We know that the population in the wilderness was as nearly stationary as possible.

The next difficulty is how they got tents, on leaving Egypt, and carried them. I might fairly say I do not know. Some may have been badly off for want of them, have made them on the journey, and while staying at Sinai for a year. As to carrying them, nothing is said; they had asses doubtless, perhaps camels, as well as oxen. The history says nothing about it. To say they could not have them is absurd. Very likely they were at first greatly in want of them. All this is to the last degree idle: it is not the object of the history to give these details. Dr. C. then takes a very difficult Hebrew word to prove that if it means "armed," there are difficulties in knowing how they got arms, or how they were afraid of Pharaoh if they had. It is really tedious to go through such absurdities. The word probably signifies that they went out "in array,"—not as poor hunted runaways: for God took them out with a high hand. "By strength of hand the Lord brought us out of Egypt." But it does not by any means follow, if their faith were not lively, that they would not be alarmed when attacked by trained soldiers. It is said in this same 13th chapter: God did not take them the short way, lest the people should repent when they saw war, and return to Egypt. And they were so disposed. God suffered their faith to be tried for a moment, and they did repent when they saw war; only now it was but to make His deliverance the more conspicuous. Nor, where faith was not in exercise, was it very wonderful. Accustomed to be slaves, with all their women and children and cattle, the way of escape barred, no practice in war, or even in any common military arrangements, they were in face of the most experienced warriors on earth, with chariots and cavalry;—themselves a great mixed multitude. When Dr. C. says "a body of 600,000 warriors," he says what is false. They were not warriors. They were of an age fit for war, even if that were true of them; but they were poor brickmakers, though now roused by God's intervention to leave the house of bondage.

The next objection as to the passover, is founded on misstatement and carelessness. Dr. C. insists it was impossible to notify it, and have all ready in time. He tells us the first notice of any such feast to be kept is given in this very chapter, where we find it written, verse 12. "I will pass through the land of Egypt this night." Hence he argues it was impossible to have all Israel ready, and insists on this night and the use of the Hebrew word hazeh. But zeh has not this kind of exactitude always. At any rate the chapter shews distinctly the falseness of the conclusion Dr. C. has drawn from it. The directions had been given at the beginning of the month, and the lamb had to be kept up three days; "This month shall be unto you the beginning of months, it shall be the first month of the year to you. Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel, saying: on the tenth day of this month they shall take to them every man a lamb, . . . and ye shall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the same month." Dr. C. says, this cannot mean that they had notice several days beforehand, because it says, I will pass through the land of Egypt this night. This is very bad indeed. Moses is told to notify to all the people to take a lamb the tenth, and to keep it to the fourteenth; and this we are told cannot mean that they got notice beforehand, because the chapter says "this night," when it comes to killing and eating it. And what can it mean else? If the lamb was not kept up from the tenth to the fourteenth, the ordinance was not kept at all. All this objection does, is to disclose the will of the objector. No doubt the momentous ordinance itself is what occupies the inspired writer; but the beginning of the chapter fully suffices to show that the objection drawn from want of time and notice, is as perverse as it is unfounded. The rest of the article does not deserve notice. In the first place kids would do, so that there was no danger of all the male lambs perishing. As to notice to start, they ate it, loins girded, and staff in hand, ready to go, and were prepared long before to be on the move, to sacrifice in the wilderness. Nor is there a word to show there was any sudden notice; or that their move was caused by the urging of the Egyptians.

Dr. C. thinks that his own confusion, in fright from a false alarm, proves that there must have been hopeless confusion in Israel. But they had for a length of time been demanding to move with all their flocks, and were now loins girt and staff in hand, so that we cannot doubt a moment that all was prepared and arranged. There is no hint of an order to start communicated suddenly. The Egyptians were urgent on them to go. They had already borrowed jewels from the Egyptians in anticipation of going. The whole theory of Dr. C. is simply inattention to the scriptural account. Because that account dwells chiefly on the great facts which have a moral import, he concludes there were none else, even when they are positively stated, and makes statements, moreover, and statements upon which all his argument depends, which are not in the passage, or actually contradict it. I may add that I do not even admit that the 600,000 were only men in the prime of age; they were all above twenty—twenty and above, that were men, besides children. This would make a considerable difference in the numbers.

As to how the herds were fed in the desert, it is certain they chose their encampment where there were springs. At Sinai, God gave them water out of a rock. I may add that Dr. C. speaks of Mount Serbal as Sinai, which is more than doubtful, or confounds two opinions, applying statements as to one incorrectly to the other, ignorant that there was any difference; which, as to the character of the place of encampment, is important. Lipsius thought Serbal was Sinai, but more exact research has made it pretty clear it was not, and shewn where Israel encamped. The attempt to say, as Dr. C. says, that the wandering in the desert is not a necessary preliminary to all the history of Israel, is too barefaced, does too much violence to the common sense of every man who has read Scripture, to call for an answer. Movements of whole nations in the deserts of Upper Asia have been frequent when there was not the miraculous interposition of God to give water, which is stated in the history of Israel. Israel stayed mainly in the north of the desert on the borders of Mount Seir and the land of Canaan, where there were wells and pasture. Though what is related in detail is what happened at Sinai at the beginning, and at the close. When Dr. C. says the Scripture story says not a word about this long sojourn near Mount Seir and the Red Sea, he makes a blunder with his usual carelessness. The Israelites got through the desert of El Tyh* (which is not the desert of Sinai, as Dr. C. says), by a rapid and short journey to the desert of Paran and Kadesh Barnea close to Canaan. There they were called on to go up the mountain of the Amorites and take possession of the land. Instead of this they sent the spies, the Lord giving his sanction to it, but at their desire. Their faith failed and they would not go up, and were condemned to wander the forty years, till the men, save Joshua and Caleb, died.

It was on their refusal to go up that they turned and went to the Red Sea (Numbers xiv. 25), and then it was they

compassed Mount Seir (Deut. i. 40), and were on the border of countries affording supplies. In one place where they had no water they were given it again miraculously, went down finally outside the Wady Akaba to the Red Sea, returned to Mount Hor for Aaron's death, and then, at last, down to the Red Sea again, going up the eastern side of the mountains of Seir to Moab and Jordan. The statement of Dr. C. is merely the result of carelessness in searching Scripture. The detail of these long years we have not ; but we have of a stay of a year in Sinai, where water was given miraculously, a short journey across El Tyh, the Lord himself leading them, their arrival at the borders of the land, and their journeying about Mount Seir and to the Red Sea, water being given them miraculously when it failed. Let me remark how beautifully at the moment they were sent back from the land through their unbelief (Numb. xiv.) God gives directions what to do in the land, shewing His promise and purpose as sure as His Word and nature, in spite of Man's folly and failure. (Numb. xv.) The only account we have of the stations between their reaching the borders of the land in the second year, and their reaching Jordan, is in Numb. xxxiii., and the localities at which they stopped during this interval of time are unknown till we come to Moseroth. Thence their journey is clear to the Red Sea, back to Hor, back to the Red Sea, and round Seir to Edom. (Comp. Numb. xxi. and Deut. x.) But we know that from Kadesh to Zered was thirty-eight years, so that they reached Kadesh in the second year before the end of it, probably a good while before, because the wars against the Amorites and Og were after Zered and before Jordan. Now they did not leave Sinai till the end of the second month of the second year. They abode in Kadesh many days, certainly more than forty, so that we are sure that the journey from Sinai to the borders of Canaan was very short indeed. They were there on the edge of cultivated land. God turned them back, but they never left the neighbourhood of Canaan, Seir, and the Red Sea. And He who turned them back took care of them, giving them water at Meribah miraculously when needed. Of all this Dr. C. is ignorant, telling us Scripture says nothing about it,—not having examined that which he is pretending to prove un-historical. This is true that the Lord gives us those parts of the journey in detail which have a moral bearing, and not how the cattle were provided for. But the book is all false if it be not historical. We have the name of each place where they stopped during the whole forty years. This must be history or forgery. I have noticed elsewhere that the statement in Deut. x. seems to contradict the list in Numbers, but becomes the strongest proof of the historical character of the book when closely examined, because we find, by careful comparison of facts and passages, that they traversed the same ground twice from Hor to the Red Sea, from the Red Sea to Hor, and then back to the Red Sea and east of Edom. But men do not make these apparent contradictions, solved by collateral facts, and shewn to be unconsciously true, save in relating real history, which, as they know the facts, they have no need to combine and arrange.

Dr. C. makes difficulties as to there being wild beasts in Canaan with so large a population. His objections are futile. What is the population of India? how dense is well known, yet tigers and wild beasts abound. Modern European populations are no rule at all, nor even Port Natal, because they settled more in Canaan in towns and villages. Counting in the Canaanites besides Israel is only another instance of Dr. C's carelessness, for the supposition made is their total immediate destruction. My own conviction is that the number of Israelites is greatly exaggerated. The 600,000 are all males not children, all the grown men.

The whole of the reasoning in the next chapter to prove the first-born more numerous than is stated seems to me an undoubted mistake. I cannot doubt that those only, and the same in Egypt, who were still members of their father's families are counted. The captive in the dungeon and Pharaoh himself may have been first-born, but it is not supposed, as in question, that they should die. It was the house. "There was not a house where there was not one dead." In each family which was together the first-born was taken. I do not believe that a first-born father and his first-born son were both taken or numbered. The first-born children of child-bearing mothers were counted. The first-born of existing families at the time of the numbering. It clearly, I apprehend, did not include old men and grandfathers whose fathers were dead, or even heads of families married out, but first-born of living mothers whose families were with them. Hence counted from a month old. Those below were yet unclean. Remark here that the question must have presented itself to the mind of the writer. It is a proof that it is historical that an evident difficulty is left unsolved. A forger does not put an evident difficulty in his account. Here we have an apparent and evident difficulty. The number of grown men is in the previous chapter. No explanation given. Why? Because the writer is stating fact, not inventing a story, and therefore states the fact without noticing the difficulty. For myself, I can only say, when I never thought of a question in it, I never took the statement as to Egypt or Israel as referring to other than families at home, unmarried members of households. Indeed, in this particular case, it may be questioned whether it was not those only born after the destruction of the first-born Egyptians to whom the ordinance here referred to was given. God says he sanctified then to Himself all the first-born. It would, perhaps, suppose an unusual number in their first year of liberation, which would be nothing extraordinary. However, on this I do not insist, as those under a month must be subtracted, who, in this case, might be numerous. "All the males," does not refer to all of all ages, but all the males as contrasted with females. Indeed, in verse 43, it is rather implied that all were not: "and all the first-born males by the number of names, from a month old and upwards of those that were numbered of them, were 22,273." But neither do I insist on this, as the Hebrew may, I apprehend, be taken as "in their numbering" the same as "in number."

As to the question of the increase of population during the sojourn of Israel in Egypt it has been discussed and rediscussed a hundred times, and it must require over-weening self-confidence in Dr. C. to bring it forward as he does as an argumentum crucis. He says the doubts he has "raised will be confirmed into a certain conviction, by its appearing plainly from the data of the Pentateuch that there could not have been any such population itself to come out of Egypt," p. 148. I suppose he must be ignorant of what has been said of it; if not, such language is simply overweening impertinence to men far better versed in such inquiries than himself. If the Israelites doubled in fifteen years, they would have been 1,146,883 in two hundred and fifteen years; in two hundred and thirty years 2,293,760. But the statement of Scripture is, that "the children of Israel were fruitful and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty, and the land was filled with them;" and the new king said, "Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we," . . . and they persecuted them. Very probably they were all removed to Goshen, giving rise to Manetho's story of Avaris. "But the more they afflicted them the more they multiplied and grew," so that their increase was not such as makes any difficulty. In England the increase in ten years was more than 23 per cent. where town and manufacturing habits largely impede, so that 35 per cent. in fifteen years is reached in the actual state of England. So that doubling in the circumstances of Israel, with extraordinary blessing in this respect, was nothing incredible, though we have no proof of their numbers more than the 600,000 males above twenty, and no proof that the majority of women were not Egyptians or other strangers. If this fact be taken into account, the increase presents no kind of difficulty. But the duration of the sojourn is a very obscure point: Josephus gives it both as two hundred and fifteen and as four hundred and thirty. The reader may see Clinton Fynes' investigation of the point, if he have access to it. He reckons two hundred and fifteen years, taking the shorter or Hebrew chronology. Many able chronologists doubt of this, as Hales. At first sight Gal. iii. 17 seems to decide the question, but when examined it does not, I think, necessarily do so. The apostle takes the time of promise as a general fact. To Abraham were the promises made and to his seed. Now the confirmation to the seed does not come in for some forty years after the promise. It is of this confirmation the apostle speaks, if we take the letter of what he says. But his object was not the date, save as showing the law coming long after the promise. He refers to Ex. xii. 40, which was sufficient for him, and is ambiguous. He may refer to patriarchal times as those of promise, and take the Egyptian state as four hundred and thirty years. The length of the sojourn in Egypt is an unsettled question.

As to the Chronicles, it is, I judge, a blunder of Dr. C.'s, which I should not think much of, were not his book solely founded on affected accuracy of detail. 1 Chron. vii. 20, presents difficulties. This is always hopeful ground for infidels. What is difficult to understand they can more easily turn to their own purpose, for others have not a positive answer ready. If we follow the statement simply, however, there is no great difficulty. The Chronicles, besides giving the history of Judah, not Israel, and especially of David's family, gather up all the fragments possible of ancient history and genealogy for the return of Israel from Babylon. Take the passage thus—"The sons of Ephraim Shuthelah:" his genealogy is followed down to a second Shuthelah, and there stops. Then the passage speaks of two other sons of Ephraim, Ezer, and Elead, who made a raid against Gath, and were killed; and then follows another son of Ephraim, which is quite natural, and his genealogy is given. His daughter Sherah is simply a descendant of his. Ammihud was fifth from Ephraim.

The objection to the numbers of the Danites and Levites, that of the former being large, though Dan had only one son, which, to an unpractised eye, may seem to present the greatest difficulty, is founded on want of attention to the reckonings of Scripture; as if in every case those mentioned are all. The very comparison with Chronicles which Dr. C. institutes ought to have taught him it was not so; for there are persons mentioned there who are not in Exodus. The genealogies are given as far as needed to make out the moral history according to God's government of Israel, but no further. Any number may be left out, even generations may, provided what is needed is given.—Next, generations are taken by Dr. C. as if they were the same then as now. They lived one hundred and thirty or one hundred and forty years, and their families were often proportionate, and here God interfered expressly to multiply them. Thus if we had not Gen. xxv. all Scripture would have led us to suppose that Ishmael and Isaac were all the sons Abraham had. Here we see he had six sons more when he was quite an old man, of whom nations sprung. Here for other purposes it was important to notice it. In other cases it was not. Next the assumption that Israel remained only two hundred and fifteen years in Egypt is a questionable one.

The number of the generation following the twelve patriarchs is no way decided. To begin the computation one really ought to take at any rate one hundred and thirty-nine, not seventy; that is, take the females in. So the children of Dinah and Serah do not appear at all. The fact of a number of children in one generation says nothing as to the result. Benjamin had many; Reuben had many. Neither were large tribes. Does Dr. C. suppose that a forger would have been insensible to this if he had been inventing? It is the strongest possible proof that the account is historical, drawn from facts, for no one would have laid himself open to the objection. There was no need whatever, but that the facts were so, to lend a handle to objectors. It was unnatural if it were not true. Dr. C. states that Moses' children were only two. I doubt it much. They were only two by Zipporah, but he had married also an Ethiopian woman. It did not concern the Scripture history to say anything of children by her. We see from the genealogies that families were reckoned all under one head if they were not numerous so as to make a distinct family (1st Chron. xxiii. 10, 11), or might come in as two when properly the head should have been but one, as Ephraim and Manasseh. If Joseph had had a dozen sons afterwards they would not have formed distinct families (Gen. xlviii. 6). They would have merged in the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh.*

All these considerations which lie at the basis of the whole system are ignored by Dr. C. We have an instance how much the names are taken merely to represent families, and how many may be left out, in the very case Dr. C. mentions, who in his usual careless and superficial way does not notice or perceive it, being simply bent on his own object. "The Amramites, he tells us, numbered as Levites in the fourth (Eliezer's) generation were, as above, only two, namely, the two sons of Moses,—the sons of Aaron being reckoned as Priests. Hence the rest of the Kohathites of this generation must have been made up of the descendants of Ishar and Uzziel," p. 169-170. This is because Ishar and Uzziel are mentioned (Exodus vi. 21, 22). But this is simply that there was some special reason for mentioning them. Kohath had another son, Hebron, who may have had, for ought we know, ten times as many. In a word those are noticed in the genealogies as to whom some special motive existed, others not. Dr. C. has not even found it out. All his calculation here is based, to say nothing of its general fallacy, upon his not noticing what was before his eyes in the text. But this fact, with a thousand other similar ones, involves a principle which makes the ground of all his calculations fundamentally false. Let the reader note this case, as it may clear his mind as to these statements of families. A genealogical succession is given, and only two sons out of four mentioned. One, it so happens, we can supply as far as it goes, because Moses and Aaron came from that stock,—the absence of the other we cannot account for. In this case we are sure of it, because he is mentioned a few verses before. Now it is just as possible, very likely indeed, that Amram may have had a host of sons besides Moses and Aaron, who are mentioned because of their importance. The names are given more to show from whom people are descended who are known, than to tell all the descendants. All this Dr. C. has overlooked, and simply made mathematical calculations as if all were given.—His whole system is false.

* As to Dan, if the absence of others of the tribe not yet formed hindered the application of the rule laid down in the case of Zelophehad's daughters, the fact that he had only one son may have been removed in a few generations. Hushim may have had as many as Jair, who had thirty sons who rode on thirty asses' colts.

Dr. C.'s computations are merely neglect of all the principles of scriptural genealogies. Besides, I repeat, the numbers given are such as prove they are not fabricated; and the paucity of Levites, and the numbers of Dan prove that the statements are drawn from history and facts, as the whole tenor of the statements bear on the face of them, and are such as no man on earth would have invented. Dr. C. says:—It is incredible the Levites should not have increased more during the sojourn in the wilderness. The fact that Eliezer did not die proves nothing as to the Levites not coming under the judgment which fell on Israel, for their murmurings when the spies returned; God was pleased to keep Israel at the same level in the wilderness. As to numbers that is clear. The Levites were no exception. God may have used providential means for this, the privations of the wilderness, which affected the Levites as well as the rest. But there is no motive for thinking they were exempt from the judgment. But the truth is the great change in relative numbers in the tribes shews all the reasoning as to the small increase of the Levites, utterly valueless. Population may increase or decrease at such a rate, but that says nothing whatever for particular families. One increases, another becomes extinct. Thus Manasseh rose from 32,200 to 52,700. Ephraim had sunk from 40,500 to 32,500. Benjamin increased from 85,410 to 45,600. Dan was stationary. Asher had increased from 41,500 to 53,400. Judah had remained pretty stationary. Issachar largely increased. Simeon had fallen from fifty-nine thousand to twenty-two. Thus the particular degree of the increase of the Levites, on which Dr. C. has bestowed so much labour, is of no import whatever. All Dr. C.'s remarks indicate a singular inattention to facts.

As regards the small number of Priests making it impossible they could fulfil their services; unless in the case of the offering of birds, it is a mistake to think the priest had anything to do save to receive the blood, and arrange a burnt-offering on the altar. All the operations of slaying, flaying, cutting up, were done by the offerer. But let it be remembered we are speaking of history. The doctrinal import (which is their real value) of the directions for the sacrifices is most precious, as these are known types of the sacrifice of Christ. No part of Scripture is more important. This of course is lost on Dr. C. Now as to history, we have no proof that a single offering was brought all the time they were in the wilderness. Burnt-offerings were always voluntary, and, in the state of Israel, it is just as likely they never troubled their heads about it ; for they sinned without compunction, and certainly had never circumcised their children, so that really they had no right to offer any sacrifice. That they did not offer a peace offering is certain, for they murmured for meat, complaining of the manna, and got the quails in chastisement ; at any rate on the second occasion. Save Miraim we do not hear of any one having the leprosy. There is no evidence of any historical difficulty whatever, but the contrary. Indeed, Amos v. 25, complains that they did not offer sacrifice to Jehovah, but took Moloch and Chiun for their Gods. History, therefore, has nothing to do with the matter ; the instruction as to priests and sacrifices, is doctrinal, not historic. The details of Dr. C.'s reasoning are as trifling as usual. As Scripture speaks often of doves in the wilderness, he assures us the Psalmist was hardly thinking of the terrible deserts of Sinai—of which he knows nothing. Was ever more egregious trifling ?

As regards the Passover, Dr. C. says it was impossible the priests could suffice to kill the Passover, and sprinkle the blood. If, as it is evident they naturally would, they kept it as they had in Egypt, every house killed the lamb for itself. The whole difficulty is a soap bubble, proving only Dr. C.'s will and foolishness. If Dr. C. had given himself the trouble of reading 2 Chron. xxx., which he quotes, he would have seen that the Levites (verse 17) killed the Passover, because many of the people had not sanctified themselves, and they did so only for those who were not clean. It rather appears that it was the blood of the burnt offering which the priests sprinkled then. At any rate, this and Josiah's Passover, when the priest did sprinkle the blood of the paschal lamb, were special exceptional cases, and there were plenty of priests and Levites attending in their places. As far as the New Testament goes, it would seem each prepared it for himself. It is really disgraceful for a person in Dr. C.'s position, or for any one, to make a formal attack on a Book he has professed to believe in, on grounds so futile, and with a carelessness which proves no honest research for himself, but that his will was father to his thought. He has at any rate proved himself, logarithms and all, to be an equally incompetent and pretentious man. Probably those by whom, nine years ago, he assures us, he was not thought unworthy of the position which he holds, supposed that, in declaring he believed in all the canonical Scriptures, he said the truth. Just think of a man taking the battle of Waterloo (and on the side of the victorious army, well knowing, as every one does, it is in pursuit most are slain,) as a test of the numbers of Asiatic armies, as to which a child, who has read Rollin's History of Greece or Persia, knows the difference.

Dr. C. complains of the destructive Razzia against Midian. Midian had been the means of corrupting Israel, and leading them to idolatry, so as to lead to 25,000 Israelites falling in the pestilence God sent; and that by the inexpressible wickedness of Balaam, who, when he could not curse Israel, recommended Balak to lead them into sin, and then God could not bless them. For this they were punished, and, as a settled nation there, destroyed. Dr. C. congratulates himself that he is not called on to believe it. But thus he must give up the whole Old Testament for his own notions; he must give up God's judging the world. God sent Abraham's seed down into Egypt because the iniquity of the Amorites was not yet full. The whole history is a history of the judicial extermination of these races for their wickedness. It is a question not of history, but of the whole ways and dealings of God in judgment. He will find it in the Psalms; he will find it in Revelations. God presents himself as a moral governor, and in this special case used human instruments to carry out his judgments, as he did afterwards against Israel, as he had warned them by the prophets. The whole establishment of Israel was founded on the principle rejected by Dr. Colenso; all God's judgments are. Dr. C. does not like to believe in judgment. Be it so. But that is no way of judging of history. As to God's revelation of himself, it is objected that the Old Testament character of God cannot be that of the true God. He did not reveal himself in Judaism. He gave laws, promises, but he dwelt in thick darkness, was avowedly hid behind the veil. The way into the holiest was not made manifest. He was patient in goodness and grace, but the system was one of public moral government. The sins of the fathers could be visited on their children, as we see still in providential government. There was a code of national laws, of which Christ could say, "Moses for the hardness of your hearts gave you this commandment." In the national laws he did not set aside slavery. The law made nothing perfect. He took, as a people in the world, the people where they were; put checks on will, softened in many respects the manners of the age by His authority, and what was an immense point, suffered nothing to be done without it—an immense point, because arbitrary will was arrested. But all this was not bringing souls to God, nor revealing God as he is to souls. He is light and love. He has been revealed in Christ, a revelation Dr. C., it appears, is content to give up. He is so wise, so competent to know God, and judge of what He ought to be, that he can give up all revelation of Him; and yet is ignorant of the first principles of the revelation he is giving up, and publishes an empty book, if ever there was one, to prove it,—assuming, as his statements are conclusive, Moses and all the prophets are ignoramuses, Christ knows no better than the Rabbis, but Dr. C., of course, does. Christ attaches His sanction to the whole of the Old Testament, as having the authority of God. Now this does not merely affirm inspiration: it is the blessed Lord putting His seal to God's having been justly represented there as thus revealed. Dr. C. thinks differently; he would not have such a God—is relieved in thinking it is not true. Christ felt no need of such relief. What shall we think of one who holds the nominal place of bishop of the Christian Church, who counts himself the moral superior of the Lord? Who else will think so? Think of the vanity and character of the man who could. Did ever a man degrade himself to the same degree! For Christ did not see any thing moral to make Him call in question its being a revelation of God. Dr. C. does. Christ could see that there were national laws given, as suited to the hardness of their hearts. That Dr. Colenso does not see. He is as ignorant of the relationship of the Gospel to the law as a national code, as he is presumptuous and ill-founded in judging the law and slighting the Gospel. For every man of sense the book will do good.

But I will complete the question of detail as to the Midianites. Numb. xxxi.; Comp. xxi. 1, and xxxiii. 33—43. The objection is, that time is not allowed for the destruction and other events before Moses addressed the people, Deut. i. 3. I have, as will be seen, no objection to the result at which Dr. C. arrives; but I will show the levity of the proofs, and then the excessive carelessness of the author. There is no proof whatever of the time employed in the destruction of Arad's cities. It is very probable the prisoners alluded to had been taken thirty-eight years before, when they would go up the mountain (Numb. xiv. 44, 45): they may or may not. Israel then defeated now avenge themselves. Five days may have very easily done the work. Further, it appears rather to have been carried into effect during the mourning for Aaron, for they left Mount Hor afterwards, Numbers xxviii. 41. Next we are told that, there was a fortnight for the serpents and healing, and then a month of journeyings. This is the usual inattention to the facts. They moved on from one station to another, and murmured because of the way, and the serpents were sent while on the journey. They had made four encampments of this journey, before the serpents were sent; this is certain, by comparing Numb. xxi. 10 and xxxiii. 41-43. Thus the three months and a half become perhaps a month and a half or two months. Sihon was defeated. It may have been in a day and the country fell to Israel. They marched thence up north, and Og came out with all his people and was defeated. For all this there may have been a month possibly more. Thus three months at the outside would have sufficed for what Dr. C. takes six months for. Let it be three and a half. This much is certain that in the point where Dr. C. is precise, the serpents and supposed subsequent journey, he is precisely wrong by not consulting the text. Dr. C. then for the remaining facts gives "March forward to the plains of Moab." March forward from where? They were in Moab, the expeditions had started thence. But they were by Arnon the border of Moab. They made then very short stages. They might move their head-quarters, but they were in Moab, only they moved into the plain from Mount Abarim. Balak was alarmed and sent for Balaam. This may have taken a week. We have thus some four months gone. Here Israel fell into sin with Moab, and thereupon Israel attacks the Midianites by divine command. My statements leave two months for this. I should be quite disposed to say with Dr. C., six weeks perhaps, and probably four, was ample so as to allow a month more for the previous marches and wars. No one can pretend to say how much each took; there was time enough for all. But this is not even necessary, though it sufficed to shew the arbitrariness and even error of Dr. C.'s calculations. More was spent in some parts; in others the text contradicts him. But what is curious enough is that Dr. Colenso has made the passages he holds to be irreconcilable, so as to prove they are unhistoric, exactly coincide by his computation, and has not found it out. Moses' address in Deut. i. 3, is after defeating Sihon and Og, as it is expressly stated, verse 4. Dr. C. says, "Thus then, from the first day of the fifth month, in which Aaron died, to the completion of the conquest of Og, king of Bashan, we cannot reckon less together than six months . . . and are thus brought down to the first day of the eleventh month, the very day on which Moses is stated to have addressed the people in the plains of Moab, Deut. i. 3." Just so, accordingly Deut. i. 4, states that it was after he had slain Og, that he made the address. Dr. C. has managed to make a blunder in his proofs, but has tumbled by mistake, into proving exactly historic what he attacks, and this is to set aside the Bible by unquestionable facts.

On the quotations from Cicero and the Hindoo author celebrating Ram, I have spoken, and add no more here. A more pretentious and futile attempt to set aside the revelation of God, it never came to my lot to examine.

It may be well just to add that the quotation from 'Types of Mankind' which Dr. Colenso quotes, as he says, with entire sympathy, is from one of two works by Messrs. Gliddon and Nott to prove that there are several races of mankind, as there are of animals, and following the analogy of the forms of these last, according to a theory of Agassiz, the object being to prove that the negroes are a distinct race, and formed and destined to be fit for slavery. I can hardly think that if he was so zealous with the Zulu for the honour of the true God as to condemn the Pentateuch because it recognized slavery in Israel, that he can have read the book. It is very superficial, is wrong according to the best authorities as to America, particularly South America, and contradicts itself as to Africa. His only argument, to which he (Mr. Gliddon) constantly recurs, being the presence of negro figures on the Egyptian monuments, of which, with Lipsius and others, he exaggerates the antiquity in a way which the monuments themselves clearly prove to be false, inasmuch as kings given as successive are proved by the monuments to be contemporary, as many as eight at a time. Mr. Gliddon was Consul General of the United States in Egypt. I quite admit Dr. C. does not quote the book in what it says of negroes, but the argument which meets his entire sympathy is used to get rid of the 'prejudice' which believes with Paul that "God has made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth," in order to justify the reducing the blacks to slavery as a distinct race.
