FOREWORD.

IN reviewing Mr. Moody's book on the Pleasure and Profit of Bible Study, Mr. Spurgeon said— "A heap of minted gold. Precious beyond money-value to all Christ's disciples, it will be of superlative help to Christian workers, who may read, and re-read, and read it yet again, with increasing profit. We bless God for this truly helpful book, and rejoice over it as one that findeth spoil."

In sober truth, these glowing words may be said of the contents of this book, which greatly remind one of the methods of Bible-Study and Bible-handling, which notably characterised the great revival times of the last century. Our friend, Charles Inglis, bears the imprint of those remarkable experiences; and his methods, more than those of any one I know, are fragrant with their memory.

It is very remarkable to witness the freshness and power that characterise a ministry which is saturated with the Word of God. Most Evangelists are content to sustain a mission for a week, or even, on rare occasions, for a month; but the author of this volume has been known, on several occasions, to prove that the interest of great cities in England or America can be maintained for week after week, till three or six months have passed. I do not say this in the strain of flattery or adulation, but as a tribute to the untold resources that lie as treasure hid in the field of scripture. Many an empty sanctuary would revive if preachers were to realise that they are not called to spin webs out of their own vitals, but are stewards charged to divide wisely the Word of Life, and to bring forth from this treasury things new and old.

Of the Analytical power of the Author, every page bears witness. Of his knowledge of the Bible, each study is evidence. Of his industry this fresh crop from a field which has already yielded many similar ones, the prodigality and profusion of these studies is conclusive proof. Indeed in him is fulfilled the ancient promise to the man who delights in the Law of God, "he shall be like a tree planted by the rivers of water that bringeth forth his fruit in his season."—F. B. MEYER.
